Dear Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th inst. in relation to the above mentioned matter.

Very respectfully,
J. H. [Name]

T. N. THE TRANSLATOR TO THE READER.

Good Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English M. Caluines booke of the institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluine first wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of smal volume, and since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new encrease, still protesting at euery edition himselfe to be one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing doe growe in profiting, and with their profiting doe proceede in writing. At length hauing in many his other works trauelled about exposition of sundry bookes of the Scriptures, and in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him and not in any other Methode, were not so ready for the readers vse, he therefore entred into this purpose to enlarge this booke of Institutions, and therein to treat of all those titles and common places largely, with this intent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other bookes to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplifie his bookes of commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholly to this storehouse & treasure of that sort of diuine learning. As age and weaknesse grew vpon him, so he hastened his labor, and according to his petition to God, he in maner ended his life with his worke, for he liued not long after. So great a iewel was meeete to be made most beneficiall, that is to say, applied to most common vse. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queenes Maiesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the Church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deere friends of worthy memorie, Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whiteburch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, and Latin toongs, the other her Highnes Printer of the bookes of common praier. I performed my worke in the house of my said friend Edward Whiteburch, a man weil knowen of vpright hart and dealing, an ancient zealous Gospeller, as plaine and true a friend as euer I knew liuing, and as desirous to do any thing to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my saide first edition of this booke, I considered how the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to pack great plenty of mater, ter in small roome of words, yea and those so circumspectly and precisely ordred, to auoid the cauillations of such, as for ennitic to the truth therein conteined, would gladly seeke & abuse all aduantages which might be found by any ouersight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothing might well be added without idle superfluitie, and againe so nicly pared that nothing could be minished without taking away some necessarie substance of matter therein expressed. This maner of writing, beside the peculiar termes of artes and figures, and the difficultie of the matters themselues, being throughout interlaced with the Schoolemens controuersies, made a great hardnesse in the authors owne booke, in that toong wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and easie, insomuch that it sufficeth not to reade him once, vnlesse you can be content to reade in vaine. This consideration encombred me with great doubtfullnesse for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I sawe that of necessitie the hardnesse in the translation must needes be greater than was in the toong wherein it was originally written. If I should leaue the course of words, and grant my selfe libertie after the naturall maner of my owne toong, to say that in English which I conceaued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceiued how hardly I might escape errour, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, how perilous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his wordes. And they that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, doe know that not the onely grammaticall construction of wordes sufficeth, but the very building and order to obserue all aduantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true letting forth of a writers minde. In the end, I rested vpon this determination, to follow the wordes so neere as the phrase of the English toong would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it shoulde not exceede the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefite is moreouer provided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine toong (which is at this time to be wished in many of those men for whose profession this booke most fitly serueth) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such few places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnish themselves with vnderstanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not only trust mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence throughout the whole booke with conference and overlooking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their iudgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be deliuered him but sound, vnmixed, and vncorrupted doctrine, euen in such sort as the author himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned, and vertuous man M. David Whitehead (whome I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining euery sentence throughout the whole booke. Beside all this, I priuately required many & generally al men with whom I euer had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amend it. Since which time I haue not beene aduertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause, why not onely at the second and third time but also at this impression, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In deede I perceiued many men well minded and studious of this booke, to require a table for their ease and furtherance. Their honest desire I haue fulfilled in the second edition, and haue added thereto a plentifull table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principal matters discoursed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and vnder euery title is set forth a brieue summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, and Section or diuision of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and procued. And for the readier finding thereof, I haue caused the number of the Chapters to be set vpon euery leafe in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsuall figures of Algorithmic. And now at this last publishing, my friendes by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romane letter and smaller volume, with diuers other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefite. Moreouer, whereas in the first edition the euill maner of my scribling hand, the enterlining of my Copie, and some other causes well knowen among workemen of that facultie, made very many faultes to passe the Printer, I haue in the second impression caused the booke to be composed by the printed copie, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needes be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my selfe doe knowe about three hundred faultes amended. And now at this last Printing, the composing after a printed copie bringeth some ease, and the diligence vsed about the correction, hauing beene right faithfully looked vnto, it cannot be but much more truly set forth. This also is performed, that the volume being smaller, with a letter faire and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common vse, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the Printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commoditie (good Readers) is provided for. Now resteth your owne diligence for your owne profit in studying it. To spend many words in commending the worke it selfe, were needelesse: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vnruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men haue written bookes of common piaces of our religion, as Melunchton, Sarcerius, and other, whose works are very good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the consenting iudgement of those that vnderstande the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Caluine, both for his substantiall sufficiencie of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deepe and strong confutation of all olde and new heresies: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable bookes for all students of Christian diuinitie. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glorie of God, and for your benefite, that you may haue this profite of my trauell, so I beseech you let me haue this vse of your gentleness, that my doings may be contriued to such good ende as I haue meant them: and that if any thing mislike you by reason of hardnesse, or any other cause that may seeme to be my default, you will not forthwith condemne the worke, but reade it offer: in which doing you will finde (as many haue confessed to me that they haue founde by experience) that those things which at the first reading shall displease you for hardnesse, shall be found so easie as so harde matter woulde suffer, and for the most part more easie than some other phraze which shoulde with greater loosenesse and sinother sliding away deceiue your vnderstanding. I confesse in deede it is not finely and pleasantly written, nor carieth with it such delightfull grace of speech as some great wise men haue bestowed vppon some foolisher things, yet it containeth sound truth set forth with faithfull plainnesse without wrong done to the authors meaning: and so if you accept and vse it, you shall not faile to haue great profite thereby, and I shall thinke my labour very well imployed.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY

AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE

THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his soueraigne Lord, Iohn Caluine wilheth peace and sal-uation in Christ,

Hen I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble King) than to write any thing that afterward should be presented to your maiestie. Only my minde was to reach certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some Zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlines. And this trauaile I tooke principally for my countrey men the Frenchmen, of whom I vnderstoode verry many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I saw verie few that had rightly received so much as any little knowledg of him. And that this was my meaning, the booke it selfe declarcth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceined, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so ferre preuailed in your Realme, that in it there is no roome for sounde doctrine: I thought I should do a thing woorth my trauaile, all in one worke both to giue an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: whereby yee may learne what maner of doctrine that is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your reaime with sword and fire. For I will not feare to confesse, that I haue in this worke comprehended in maner the summe of that selfe same doctrine against which they crye out, that it ought to be punished with imprisonment, banishment, condemnation without iudgement, and with fire, that it ought to be chased away by land and sea. I know indeede with howe banisus insinuations they haue filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to weighe, that there shall be no innocencie, neither in words nor deedes, if it may be enough to accuse. Truly if any, to bring the same in hatred shall alledge that this doctrine whereof I now go about to yeeld account vnto you, hath bene long ago condemned by consent of all degrees, and attainted by many iudgements already given in iudiciall courts, all that he saith shall amount to no more but that it hath partly bene violently throwen downe by the banding and power of the aduersaries thereof, and partly bene traiterously and fraudulentlie oppressed with their lies and suttile practises and standers. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause, bloudie sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraude, that it is without deseruing accused of sedition and euill doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these things, you your selfe can beare witnes, most noble King, with how lying standers it is daily accused vnto you: as, that it tendeth to no other end but to wrathe from Kings their sceptors out of their hands, to throwe downe all iudges seates and iudgements, to subuert all orders and euill governments, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to abolish all lawes, to vnloose all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things upside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthily iudge it with the maintainers thereof, worthie of a thousand fires and gallows. How can now maruell that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are belieued? Lo, this is the cause that all degrees agree and conspire to the condemning of vs and our doctrine. They that sit to iudge, being punished with this affection pronounce for sentences their foreconceiued determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they haue well enough discharged their duties, if they command no man to be drawn to execution, but such as are founde guiltie either by their owne confession or by sufficient witness. But of what faule? of that condemned doctrine, saie they. But by what law condemned? Herein should haue stand the succour of defence for them, not to demie the doctrine it selfe, but to maintaine it for true. But heere is all libertie once to mutter, vtterly cut off from vs.

Wherefore I do not vnjustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your owne hand the whole bearing of the cause which hitherto hath been troublefomly handled or rather carelesly tossed without all order of lawe, more by outrageous heate than iudicial grauitie. Neither yet thinke, that I there go about to make mine owne private defence, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrie, to which although I beare such affection of naturall loue as becometh me: yet as the case nowe is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take vpon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day hauing beene by all meanes torne and troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that indeede rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharises than by your owne knowledge. But howe that commeth to passe, it is not heere needfull to tell: truely it lieth in great distres. For thus farre haue the vngodly preuailed, that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vnguarded: as for the sillie poore Church, it is either wasted with cruell slaughters, and so drinen away with banishments, or dismayed with threatens and terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage and fiercenes as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending and the ruine which themselves haue made. In the meane time no man steppeth forth, to set himselfe in defence against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fauour the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskillfulnesse of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and vnskillfulnesse which they know to be the most certaine truth of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so despised but that he hath vouchsafed to communicate to them the mysteries, of his heauenly wisdom. So much are all ashamed of the Gospell. It shall be your office (most noble king) not to turne away your eares nor your minde from so iust a defence: specially when so great a matter is in question: namely how the glorie of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the truth of God may keepe her honor, how Christ may haue his kingdome preferred whole among vs. This is a matter worthe for your eares, worthe for your iudgement, worthe for your royall throne. For, euen this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge himselfe in the gouernance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now vse a kingdome but a robbrie, which reigneth not to this end that he may serue the glory of God. And he is deceiued that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdome, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holie word: forasmuch as the heauenly Oracle cannot procure vaine, whereby it is proclaimed, that the people shall be scattered abroad where prophetic saileth. Neither ought the contempt of our basenesse to withdrawe you from this purpose. We verily knowe right well, how poore and abiect sillie men we bee, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrements and outcastes of the worlde, or whatsoever viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for vs to glorie vpon before God, but his onely mercie whereby we are without any our deserving received into the hope of eternall saluation: and before men, nothing but our weaknesse, which among them it is taken for a most great shame to confesse so much as in countenance. But our doctrine must be aduanced hie aboue all glorie of the world, must stand vnuanquishable aboue all power: because it is not ours, but the doctrine of the liuing God and of his Christ, whome the Father hath appointed king to beare rule euen from sea to sea, and from the riuers euen to the ends of the earth: and so to beare rule, that striking the whole earth with the onely rod of his mouth, he may breake it with all the iron and brasen strength, with all the golden and siluer glistering thereof, as it were potters vessels: as the prophetes prophetic of the roialtie of his kingdome. Our aduersaries in deede doe crie out to the contrarie, and say that we falslie pretende the word of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not onely a malicious scilaunder, but also a notable shamelesnesse, you your selfe by reading our confession, may according to your wisdome iudge. Yet here it is also good to say somwhat, either to moue you to willingnesse and heedfulness, or at the least to prepare you a waie to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all prophetic to be framed to the agreeablenesse of faith, hath set a most sure rule whereby the expounding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is alreadye in our hands. For what doth better or more filie agree with faith, than to acknowledge our selues naked of al vertue, that of God we may be clothed? emptie of al good, that of him we may be filled? the bondseruants of sinne, that of him we may be made free? blinde, that of him we may be enlightened? lame, that of him we may be made streight? feeble, that of him we may be uphelden? to take from our selues all matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious onelie, and in him we may glorie? When we say these and such like things, they interrupt vs and crie out, that by this meane is ouerthrowen I wote not what blinde light of nature, famed preparations, free will, workes meritorious of eternall saluation, together with their supererogations: because they cannot abide that the whole praise and glorie of all goodnes, vertue, righteousness, and wisdom should remaine in God. But wee read not that they were blamed that haue drawen too much out of the fountaine of liuing water: on the contrary side they are sharpely rebuked which haue digged to themselues pittes, broken pittes, which are not able to hold water. Againe, what is more agreeable with faith, than to promise to themselues that God will bee to them a sauourable Father, where Christ is acknowledged to bee a brother and procurer of saucour? than assuredlie to looke for all things ioyfull and prosperous at his hands, whose vspeakable loue towards vs hath proceeded so farre, that hee hath not spared his onely begotten sonne, but that he gaue him for vs? than to rest in sure looking for saluation and eternall life, where wee thinke vpon Christ giuen of the Father, in whom such treasures are hidden? Here they step in against vs, and crie out that this certaintie of affiance is not without arrogancie and presumption. But as nothing of our selues, so all things ought we to presume of God: and we are for some other reason spoiled of vaine glorie, but that wee shoulde learne to glorie in the Lord. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the partes of our cause, and thinke that we are woorse than any kinde of wicked men, vnlesse you plainly finde that we are in trouble and railed at, because wee put our trust in the liuing God: because we beleene that this is the eternall life, to knowe one true God, and him whome hee hath sent Jesus Christ. For this hope, some of vs are bound in irons, some are whetped, some are carried about in mockage, some are condemned without iudgement, some are most cruelly tormented, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terrible cursed, torne with slanders, and handled in most vniuous wise. Now looke vpon our aduersaries (I speak of the degree of priests, at whose becke and will the other exercise enimities against vs) and consider with me a little while, with what zeale they be carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the Scriptures, and which ought to bee holden certaine among all men, they castie gine leaue both to themselues and other to bee ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they thinke that it maketh small matter what enerie man belceue or not beleene concerning God and Christ, so that he do with an vnexpressed faith (as they call it) submit his minde to the iudgement of the Church: neither are they much moued, if it happen that the glory of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift vp his finger against the supremacie of the Apostolicke see, and authoritic of our holie mother the Church. Why therefore dee they with so great crueltie and fiercenesse fight for the Masse, Purgatorie, Pilgrimages, and such trifles, so farre forth, that they saie that without most expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godlinesse cannot stande, whereas yet they prouue not that any of these things come out of the word of God? Why so, but because their bellie is their God, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely bee no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them do plentifully glorie themselues, and other some live with gnawing of poore cristles, yet they live all of one Pot, which without these warming helpes should not onely waxe cold, but also thoroughly freeze. Therefore how much more ene-rie of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrier he is for their faith. Finally they all endeour themselves to this, to keepe still either both Kingdome safe, and their belly full : but of pure Zeale none of them sheweth anie token, be it neuer so little. Neither yet so doe they cease to flounder our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it newe, and lately forged : they canill that it is doubtfull, and vncertaine : they demaunde by what miracles it is confirmed : they aske whether it be meete that it should preuaile against the consent of so many holie fathers :

and the most ancient custome : they presse vpon vs to confesse it to be schismaticall, which mooueth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in manie ages in which no such thing hath bene heard of. Last of all they say that there neede no arguments, for (saie they) it may by the fruites be iudged of what sort it is, namelie which hath bred so huge a heape of sectes, so manie turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truly full easie it is for them, to triumph vpon a forsaken cause before the light-beeinging and ignorant multitude. But if we might also haue our turne likewise allowed vs to speake verilie this sharpe heate would soone be cooled wherewith they doe so with full mouth and as licentiously as vnpunishedly some against vs.

Rom. 1.25.
First, whereas they call it new, they doe great wrong to God, whose holie word deserued not to be accused of newnesse. To them in deede I nothing doubt that it is newe, to whome Christ is new, and his Gospell is new. But they which knew that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Iesus Christ died for our finnes, and rose againe for our iustification, shall finde nothing newe among vs. Whereas it hath long lien hidden vnknewen, and buried : that is the fault of the vngodlinesse of men. Now sith it is by the bountifullnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receive againe the title of ancientie.

Esaie. 1.13.
Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take it for doubtfull and vncertaine. This verily is it which the Lorde by his prophet complaineth, that the ox knew his owner, and the asse his maisters stall, but his people knew not him. But howsoeuer they mocke at the vncertaintie of it : if they were driuen to seale their owne doctrine with their owne blood, and with losse of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our affiance, which dreadeth neither the terrours of death, nor yet the very iudgement seate of God.

Maik. 16.20.
Aet. 14.3.
Heb. 2.4.
Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale vnrasonable with vs. For we coine no newe Gospell, but holde fast the selfe same Gospell, for confirming of the truth whereof all the myra-cles do serue that euer Christ and his Apostles haue done. But this thing they haue speciall aboue vs, that they can euen to this day confirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alleage miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwise well stablshed : they are so either trifling and worthin to be laughed at, or vaine and lying. And yet, although they were neuer so monstrous, they ought not to haue bene of anie value against the worde of God : forasmuch as the name of God ought both in euerie place and at euerie time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by naturall order of things. This saife colour might peradventure haue made the better shewe, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawfull ende and vse of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it : Likewise Luke also saith that the Lord did beare witness to the worde of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the handes of the Apostles. Wherewith wholly agreeth that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, saluation was confirmed by this, that the Lorde did beare witness to it with signes, and wonders, and diuers powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall wee turne to the destroying of the credite of the Gospell? those things which are appointed onely to stablsh the truth, shall we applie to confirming of lies? Therefore it is meete that the doctrine, which (as the Euangelist saith) goeth before miracles, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marke, if it tend not to the seeking of the glorie of men, but of God. Such Christ affirmeth this to be the proof of doctrine, miracles are wrongly esteemed which are drawn to any other end than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remember it as satan hath his miracles, which although they be ingling deceites rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceiue the ignorant and vnskilfull. Magicians and enchanters haue bin a wayes famous in miracles: wonderful miracles haue nourished idolatrie: which yet do not proue to vs, that the superstition of Magicians & idolaters is lawfull. And with this battering ram in old time the Donatists did shake the simplicitie of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we do now make the same answer to our aduersaries, which Augustine then made to the Donatistes: that the Lorde hath made vs wary against such miracle workers, when he foretold that there should come false prophets, which with lying signes and diuers wondrous, should if it were possible, bring the elect into error. And Paul hath giuen warning that the kingdome of Antichrist should be with all power, & signes, & lying wonders. But these miracles (say they) are done not of idols, not of sorcerers, not of false prophets, but of the saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of satan, to transfigure himselfe into an angel of light. In old time the Egyptians worshipped Icreny which was buried among them, with sacrifices & other diuine honors. Did not they abuse the holy prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tomb, they obtained that they thought the healing of the stingings of the serpents to be the iust rewarde thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath bene and ever shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to sende strength of illusion to them that haue not receiued the loue of truth, that they may beleue lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, and not subiect to cavillations. As for miracles which they bring forth for themselues, they are meere illusions of satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanitie.

Moreover, they do slanderously set the Fathers against vs (I meane the ancient Fathers and the writers of the age as yet more vncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of their vngodlinesse: by whose authoritie if the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victorie (to speake euen most modestly) would bende to our side. But whereas many things haue bene excellently well and wisely written of those Fathers, and in some things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good naturall children forsooth, according to the rightnes that they haue, both of wit, iudgement, and minde, doe worstye oney their fautes and errors: and those things which are well spoken, they either marke not, or fame as if they knewe them not, or doe corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gold of the fathers. Then they oppresse vs with importunate crying out against vs, as disturbers and enemies of the Fathers. But we doe so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could verie easilie prouue by their consenting voices, the greater part of these things that we say at this day. But we so read their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, to serue vs, not to haue dominion ouer vs: and that we are Christes alone, whom we must obey in all things without exception. Who so keepeth not this choise, shall haue nothing certaine in Religion: forasmuch as those holie men were ignorant of manie things, doe oftentimes striue one with another, yea and sometimes fight with themselues. Nor without cause (sue they) wee are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the olde boundes which our Fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fieldes, and the obedience of Faith, which ought to be so framed that it forget her people and the house of her father. If they haue so great delight to vse allegories, why do they not rather expound the Apostles, than any other to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to plucke vp for so did Hierome expound it, whose words they haue registered among their Canons. But if they will haue the boundes of the same fathers, whom they meane, to be strictly kept: why do they so oft as they list, so licentioustly passe them? Of the number of the fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, and that therfore he needeth neither cups nor dishes: the other said, that the holy things require not gold, and that those things please not with golde, which are not bought with golde. Therefore they passe the bounde, which are in the holy things so much delighted with golde, silver, iuorie, marble, precious stones and silkes, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipped, vnlesse altogether they be dissolute lie set out with exquisite gorgousnesse, or rather with outrageous excesse. A Father was he, which saide, that he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they passe the boundes, when they accurse the soule that tasteth flesh in lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said, that a Manke which laboreth not with his hands, is iudged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you will) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawfull for monks to liue of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplations, in Prayers, in studie. This bound also they haue passed, when they placed the idle and barrell bellies of monks in stewes and brothel houses to be satisfied with other mens substance. A father was he, which said, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of a me saint in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiasticall Councell, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on wals. They are farre from holding themselves within these boundes, when they leaue nor one corner without images. Another Father counselled, that hauing done the dutie of naturall kindeesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These boundes they breake, when they cast into men a continuall carelesnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testifieth that the substance of bread and wine in the Sacrament of the Supper so remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lorde Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man ioined with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which saue that after the words of the Lorde rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, that it may be transubstantiate into his bodie and blood. Fathers were they which as they deliuered to the whole Church but one sacrament of Thanksgiuing, and as they debarred from it wicked and hainous euill doers: so did greuously condemne all those which being present, did not communicate of it. How farre haue they remoued those boundes, when they fill not onely Churches, but also private houses with their masses, and admit all men to looke vpon them, and euery man so much more gladly as he more largely payeth, how vnleane and wicked soeuer they bee: but allure no man to faith in Christ and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe boastingly set out to sale their owne worke for the grace and merite of Christ? Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should bee altogether debarred from the vse of the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the one kinde, abstained from the other. And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the Christian people the blood of the Lorde ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commaunded to shed their owne blood. These boundes also they haue taken away, when they haue by an inuolable lawe commaunded the selfe same thing which the one of these Fathers punished with excommunication, and the other reproofed with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be rashnesse to determine any thing of a doubtful matter on the one side or the other, without cleere and euident witnessings of the Scripture. This bound they forgot, when they established so many constitutions, so many ciuils, so manie maisterly determinations, without any worde of God. A father was he, which among other heresies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fastings. This bound also they haue farre passed, when they commaunded fasting with most straight lawes. A Father was he, which denied that marriage ought to bee forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a mans lying with his owne wife to be chasteitie: and Fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritie. Beyond these boundes haue they gone, when they seuerely enioined vnmarrried life to their sacrificers. A Father was he which iudged, that onely Christ ought to be heard, of whom it is saide, Heare him: and that we ought not to haue regards, what other men which were before vs, haue saide or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commaunded. This bounde neither doe they appoint to themselves, nor doe suffer other to haue it appointed them, when they set both ouer themselves and other any masters whatsoeuer they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that the Church ought not to set it selfe before Christ, because he alwaie iudged truly: but the iudges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceiued. They breaking through this bound also, sticke not to affirme that the whole authoritie of the Scripture hangeth vpon

the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers haue with one hart accursed, and with one mouth pronounced it abhorminable, that the holy Worde of God should be entangled with the subtleties of Sophisters, and brawlings of Logicians. Doe they holde themselves within these bounds, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but with endlesse strifes, and more than sophisticall brabblings to wrap and eucombe the simplicitie of the Scripture? so that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, and should heare such an arte of brawling, which these men call Speculative Diuinitie, they would beleeue that nothing lesse is done than any disputation had of God. But my talke should spread it selfe beynd due bounds, if I would reckon vpon how boldly these men shake off the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be. Truly both monethes and yeeres would be too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we stick not to passe the ancient boundes.

But now whereas they call vs to custome, they nothing preuaile. For we should be most vniustly dealt with, if we should be driuen to yeelde to custome. Truly if the iudgements of men were right, Custome should be taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to bee done of manie, by and by obtaineth the right of a Custome. But the state of men hath scarcely at any time beene in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the priuate vices of manie hath beene made a publike error, or rather a common consent of vices, which now these good men would haue to stande for a lawe. Who so haue eyes doe see that not onely one sea of euils hath ouerflowed, manie poisonous pestilences haue inuaded the worlde, that all things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be viterly despaird, or we must lay hande vnto, or rather vse violence vpon so great euils. And remedie is by no other reason driuen away, but because we haue now long time accustomed vs to euils. But be it that publike error haue place in matters of common weale: yet in the kingdome of God his vncle truth is to be heard and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeeres, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in olde time Eliaie taught the elect of God, that they should not say Conspiring, to all things in which the people saide Conspiring: that is to saie, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lorde of hostes, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list obiect against vs both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lorde of hostes, we will not be much afrayde. For whether it be that manie ages haue consented to life vngodlinesse, hee is strong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe same wickednes, he hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with the multitude, when he did with a generall ouerflowing destroy the whole kinde of men, preserving Noe with a small household, which should by his faith being but one man condemne the whole world. Finally an euill custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they do neuertheless die that die with compagne of a multitude. Moreover they ought to haue considered that which Cyprian saith in certaine places, that they which sinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselves from all fault, yet may seeme after some manner excusable: but who so obstinately refuse the truth offered by the grace of God, they haue nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they do not driue vs to so hard a streight with it, to compell vs to confesse, that either the Church hath lien dead a certaine time, or that wee haue controwersie against the church. Truly the church of Christ hath liued and shall liue, so long as Christ shall raigne at the right hand of the father: by whose hand she is vpholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power shee keepech her safetie. For he will vndoubtedly performe that which he hath once promised, that he will be present with his euen vntill the ending of the world. Against it now we haue no warre at all. For we doe with one consent together with all truth, when they acknowledge no church, but which they see with present eye, & go about to compass it about with those bounds in which it is not enclosed. Upon these points hangeth our controuersie: first that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appeering & to be seene: then, that they set the same forme in the see of the church of Rome, and in the order of their prelates. Upon the contrarie side affirme, both that the church may consist of no appeering forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shewe, which they foolishly haue in admiration, but hath a farre other marke, namely the pure preaching of the worde of God, and the right ministracion of sacraments. They are in a rage, vnlesse the church may be alwayes pointed out with a finger. But how oft happened it in the people of the Jewes to bee so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to haue shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the coming of Christ hath it lien hidden without forme? How since that time hath it bene so oppressed with wars, seditions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liued at that time, would they haue beleueed that there was any Church? but it was saide to Helias, that there were preferred seuen thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to bee doubtfull to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since hee ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable forme with their eyes, should they not by and by haue been discouraged? And verily Hilarie accounted it euen already in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that visor. For thus he saith: One thing I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the loue of wals: ye do ill worship the Church of God in houses and buildings: vnder them ye do ill thrust in the name of peace. It is doubtfull that in those Antichrist shall sit? Mountaines & woods and lakes, & prisons, and canes are safer for me. For in these the prophets, when they were either abiding or thrown into them, did prophetic. But what doth the world at this day honor in his horned bishops, but that it thinketh them to be holy prelates of religion, whom it seeth to be heades ouer great Cities? Away therefore with such foolish esteeming. But rather let vs leaue this to the Lord, for as much as hee alone knoweth who bee his, and sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeance of God vpon the earth. But if the wickednes of mens deserue, why doe wee seeke to withstande the iust vengeance of GOD? In such wise the Lorde hath in times past taken vengeance of the vthankfulnessse of men. For because they would not receiue his truth, and had quenched his light, hee suffered them beeing blinded in sense, both to bee mocked with lies full of absurditie, and to be drowned in deepe darkenessse, so that there was no face of the true Church to bee seene. Yet in the meane time hee saued his both beeing scattered abroad and lying hidden in the middlest of errorrs and darkenessse, from destruction. And no maruell. For he can skill to saue both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they would haue the forme of the Church to bee iudged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: how perillous that is, I will rather point vnto than declare, least I should drawe out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike see, and the bishops that are annointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and miters, doe represent the church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot erre. How so? because they are pastors of the Church, and consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israel also Pastors? But Aaron and his sounnes after that they were made priestes, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the fewer hundred Prophets which lied to Achab, haue represented the Church? But the Church was on Michas side, being indeed but one man at me, and vnguarded, but out of whose mouth came truth. Did not the false Prophets in resemblance beare both the name and face of the church, when they did with one violent assaile rise vp against Ieremy, and with threatening boasted that it was not possible that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the worde from the Prophet? Ieremy alone was sent against the whole companie of the Prophetes, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the word from the Prophet. Did not such a glistering shew shine in that counsell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them go & stick fast in the outward view, that they may make Christ & at the prophets of God, schismatikes: & on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answer me, in what nation and place they thinke that the church remained since the time that by the decree of the counsell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and deprived from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the counsell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinalls and Bishops, which had with him practised the dissolution of the Counsell. Yet afterward being borne vp by the fauour of Princes, hee recovered his papacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had bene orderly made by the authoritie of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauing that hee himselfe was appeased with a Cardinalls hat, as it were a barling dog with a peece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebelles, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots and Priests, that haue bene since. Heere they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the church? will they denie that the counsell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outward maiestie: namely, which being solemnly summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same dignitie to the last end? Will they confesse Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the church, or they all as many as are of them shall be of vs accounted schismatikes, which wittingly and willingly haue bene ordered of heretikes. If it had neuer before bene knowne, that the church is not bound to outward pompes, they themselues may be to vs a large prooffe, which vnder that glorious title of the church haue so long so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragicall doings wherewith their whole life swarmeth full: because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to read our writings, you shall plainly know that the verie doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they bee the church is a deadly butcherie of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the church.

Finally they do not uprightly enough, when they doe spitefully rehearse how great troubles, reproves, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawen with it, and what fruites it now beareth in many. For the blame of these evils is vnworthily laid vpon it which ought rather to haue bene imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall property of the word of God, that whensoever it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which do easily shewe forth themselues when they are receiued with fauourable eares of all men, and are heard of the world reioicing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all things were drowned in deepe darkenesse, the Lorde of this worlde made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should hee else do but laugh and plaie being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shinning from above somewhat scattered abroad his darkenesse, when that strong man troubled and assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his woonted drowsinesse, and hastily to arme himselfe. And first he stirred vp the force of men, whereby he might violently oppress the truth beginning to shine. By which when he nothing preuailed, he turned to subtiler enuillings. He stirred vp dissensions & disagreements of doctrines by his Cathartists, and other monstrous lewd men, whereby he might darken it and at length utterly quench it. And now hee continueth to assayle it with both engines. For he trauelleth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede: and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choake it, that it may not growe and beare fruit. But all this hee doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his crafts vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, & hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But howe great maliciousnes is it to laye vpon the word of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which naughie and rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceiuers do raise against it? Yet it is no newe example. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditions man. The Apostles were accused of making a commotion among the people. What other thing do they which at this day do father vpon vs all the troubles, vprores and contentions that boile vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namely that it is not we that scatter errors or stir vp vprores: but it is they themselues that wastile against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beate backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to meete with the weakenesse of other, who oftentimes happen to be mooued with such offences, and in their dismayng to wauer. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismayng and be discouraged, know that the Apostles in their time feit by experience the same things that now happen vnto vs. There were vnlearned and vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, which when they heard that sin abounded, to the end that grace might more abound, by and by objected, We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfull are not vnder the law, they by and by answered, We will then sinne, because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to euill. There entred priuily many false Apostles to destroy the Churches which he had builded. Some by enmie and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospell, thinking to adde more affliction to his bandes. Somewhere the Gospell not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the things of Iesus Christ. Some went backward, dogges to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the libertie of the Spirit to the licentiousnesse of the flesh. Many bretheren crept in, by whom there came afterward great danger to the godly. Among the brethren themselves were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles haue done in this case? Should they not either haue dissembled for a time, or rather altogether haue giuen ouer and forsoken the Gospell, which they saw to be the seedplot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for helpe in such distresses this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set vnto the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which affiance they being armed, went forward boldly through all dangers of vprores and offences. With the same thought we also ought to be upholden, forasmuch as Paul testifieth that this is the perpetuall proprietie of the Gospell to be the saour of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordained to this vse that it should be the saour of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the saluation of the faithfull: which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vnthankfulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefite of God, and turne that to our owne destruction which ought to haue beene to vs the onely defence of our safetie.

But now I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reportes nothing moue you, by which our aduersaries trauell to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this new Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the Author of diuision, but of peace: and the Souer of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Diuell. And we are vnworthily accused of such desires, wherof we neuer gaue any suspicion were it neuer so small. It is likely that we forsooth doe praclise the ouerthrowing of kingdomes, of whom there hath neuer bene heard any one seditions word, whose life hath euer been known quiet & simple, when we liued vnder you, and which now being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your Kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behaviours although many things may be found faultie, yet there is nothing worthy of so great reproching: neither haue we with so ill success (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospell, but that our life may be to these backbiters an exemplar of chastitie, liberalitie,

mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and what soeuer other vertue. Verilie it is by the prooffe it selfe eident that we doe vnfeinedly feare and worship God, for as much as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life & our death, and enuie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witnes of innocencie and ciuill vprightnes, in whome this only thing was punished with death, which ought to haue bene accounted for a singular praise. But if any vnder pretence of the Gospell doe stirre vp tumultes (as hitherto it hath not bene found that there haue bene any such in your Realme) if any pretend the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I haue knowen many) there be lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their deseruings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not euill spoken of for the wickednes of naughty men. Thus haue you (O King) the venemous vniustice of the sclaunderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an care of too easie beleefe bend to their reportes. I feare me also least it be too largely set out, for as much as this preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole Booke of defense, whereby I intended not to make a defense in deede, but onely to mollifie your minde aforehand to giue audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shall be able to recover the fauor thereof, if you shall once haue without displeasure and troublous affection read ouer this our confession, which we will to be in steede of a defence for vs to your Maiestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious doe so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused men, to speake for themselues: and if those outrageous furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with prisoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shall in deede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and waite for the strong hand of the Lord: which shall without doubt be present in time, and stretch forth it selfe armed, both to deliuer the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumph with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kings stablish your throne with righteousness, and your seate with equitie, most noble King.

IOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

T the first setting out of this worke, bicaufe I did not looke for that successe, which the Lorde of his vnrmeasurable goodnes hath giuen, I had (as men vse to do in small works) for the more part lightly passed it ouer. But when I vnderstood that it was receiued with that fauour of all the godly, which I neuer durst haue desired, much lesse haue hoped for: as I verily felt in my hart that much more was giuen to me than I had deserued, so I thought it should be a great vnthankfulnes if I should not at the least aser my slender abilitie endeour to answer so fauourable affections toward me, and which of themselues prouoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onely in the second setting foorth of it: but howe oft since that time the worke hath bin imprinted, so oft hath it bin enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labour that I had imployed: yet I neuer held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Nowe I trust I haue giuen you that which may be allowed by all your iudgements. Truely with how great endeour I haue applied my selfe to the doing of this seruice to the Church of God, I may bring foorth for an euident witnes, that this last winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had summoned me to death, how much more the sicknes enforced vpon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to ouerliue me, which might make some part of thankfull recompence to so gentle prouoking of the godly. I had rather indeed it had bin don sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroad in good season, when I shal perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentifull fruite than it hath done heeretofore to the church of God. This is my onely desire. And truly full ill it were with me, if I did not holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the iudgements of men, whether they be the foolish and forward iudgements of the vnskilfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly seled my mind to the endeour both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profic: and though I am cleere in mine owne conscience, & haue himselfe and the angels to witnes with me, that since I tooke vpon me the office of a teacher in the church, I haue tended to none other purpose but that I might profit the Church in mainteining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath bin snatched at, bitten and torne in sunder with more slanders than I. When my

Epistle

To the Reader.

Epistle was now in printing, I was certainly enformed that at Augsburgh where the assemblie of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my reuolting to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily receiued in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignorant of many trials had of my stedfastnes, which trials as they shake off so foule a slander, so they should with all indifferent and gentle iudges haue defended me frō it. But the diuell with his whole route is deceiued if in oppressing me with filchy lies, he think that by his vniust dealing I shall be either the more discouraged or made the lesse diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his vnmeasurable goodnes will grant me that I may with euen sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I giue to the godly Readers a new prooffe in this setting forth of this booke. Now in this trauell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy diuinitie to the reading of the word of God, that they may both haue an easie entrie into it, and go forward in it without stumbling: for I thinke that I haue in all points so knit vp together the summe of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well haue it in minde, it shall not be harde for him to determine both what he ought chiefly to seeke in Scripture: and to what marke to applie whatsoever is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plain, if I shall hereafter set forth any expositions of Scripture, because I shall not need to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, & to wander out into cōmon places: I will alway knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shall be eased of great paine and tediousnes, so that he come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessarie instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clerely as in mirrors appeere in so many cōmentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeed what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receiue any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

2 What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

4 That the same knowledge is either choaked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

5 That the knowledge of God doeth shinningly appeare in the making of the world, and in the continuall gouernment thereof.

6 That to attaine to God the creator, it is needfull to haue the scripture to be our guide and maistresse.

7 By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witness of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine: And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

8 That so far as mans reason may bear, there are sufficient proofes to stablish the credit of the Scripture.

9 That those fantastick all men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, do ouerthrow all the principles of godlinesse.

10 That the Scripture, to correct al superdition, doth in comparison set the true God against al the Gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

11 That it is vnlawtull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, & that generally, they forsake God, so many as do erect to themselues any images.

12 That God is seuerally discerned from idols, that hee may bee onely and wholly worshipped.

13 That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the verie creation, which essence containeth in it three persons.

14 That the Scripture euen in the creation of the world, and of all things, doth by certain marks put difference between the true God, and faigned Gods.

15 What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, and of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.

16 That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the worlde, which himselve hath created, and by his prouidence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.

17 Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applied, that wee may be certaine of the profit thereof.

18 That God doth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so boweth their mindes to put his iudgement in execution, that yet still himselve remaineth pure from all spot.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

*That the knowledge of God, and of our selues, are things conioyned :
and how they be linked the one with the other.*

HE whole summe in a manner of all our wisdom, which onely ought to be accounted true and perfect wisdom, consisteth in two partes, that is to say, the knowledg of God, and of our selues. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bondes linked together : yet whether goth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discern. For, first no man can looke vpon himselfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whom he liueth and is moued: because it is plaine, that those giftes wherewith we be indued, are not of our selues, yea, euen that that we haue being is nothing els but an clesse in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certaine streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeereth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, wherinto the fall of the first man hath throwne vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eies, not onely being foodlesse and hungrie, to craue from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humilitie. For as there is found in man a certaine worlde of all miseries, and since we haue beene spoyled of the diuine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinite heape of filthie disgracements : it must needs be that euery man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne unhappinesse to make him come at the least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the vnderstanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggerie, weakenesse, perversnesse, and corruption, we learne to reknowledge that no where else but in the Lord abideth the true light of wisdom, found vertue, perfect abundance of all good things, and puritie of righteousnes. And so by our owne euils we are stirred to consider the good things of God : and we cannot earnestly aspire toward him, vntill we begin to mislike our selues. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in himselfe ? yea, who doth not rest, so long as he knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne giftes, and ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne miserie ? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

2 Again, it is certaine, that man neuer commeth vnto the true knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse he hath first beholden the face of God, and from beholding thereof doe descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntill that with manifest proues we be conuincid of our vnrighteousnesse, filthinesse, follie and vncleannes.

Whether we consider our being, the giftes wherewith we are indued, or the euils that are found in vs, we are thereby led to the knowledge of God.

Till we haue considered the excellencie, wisdom and all vertues, which is in God, we neuer knowe our owne imperfections.

Cap. I. Of the knowledge of

cleannes. But we are not conuincid thereof, if we looke vpon our selues onely, and not vpon God also, who is the onely rule whereby this iudgement ought to be tried. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousness doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousness in deed, And because there appeereth nothing among vs, nor about vs, that is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthie pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we hold our selues within the boundes of mans vncleannes. Like as the cie that is vsed to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discern by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at midday we either looke downe vpon the ground, or beholde those things that round about lie open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to haue very assured and peacing force of sight: but when we looke vp to the sunne, and beholde it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpenesse that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightnes by and by daseled and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse that the same sharpe sight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the sunne, is but meere dulnes. Euen so commeth it to passe in waighing our spirituall good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, so long being wel contented with our owne righteousness, wisdom & strength, we doe sweetely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner halfe gods. But if we once begin to raise vp our thought vnto God, and to waigh what a one he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisdom and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousness, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednes: then that which did maruellously deceiue vs vnder colour of wisdom, shall sinke before vs as extreme follie: then that which did beare the face of strength, shall be proued to be most miserable weakenes. So slenderly doth that which in vs seemeth euen most perfect, answere in proportion to the purenes of God.

3 Heereof proceedeth that trembling and amazednes, wherewith the scripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were stricken and astonied so oft as they perceiued the presence of God. For when we see that they which in his absence did stand assured and vnmoued, so soone as he discloseth his glorie, begin so to quake and are so dismayed, that they fall downe, yea are swallowed vp, and in manner are destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered thereby, that man is neuer sufficiently touched and inwardly moued with knowledge of his owne basenes, vntill he haue compared himselfe to the maiestie of God. But of such dismayng we haue often examples both in the Iudges and in the Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall die because the Lord hath appered vnto vs. And therefore the historie of Iob, to throw men downe with knowledge of their owne follie, weaknes, and vncleannes, bringeth alway his principall prooffe from describing Gods wisdom, strength and cleannes. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the neerer that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowledged himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tarie his comming to him with vncouered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man doe that is but corruption and a worme, when euen the Cheubins for very feare must hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Esaie speaketh of: The Sunne shall blush, and the Moone shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hostes shall raigne, that is to say, when he displaith his brightnes, and bringeth it neerer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brightest thing of all shall be darkened. But howsoeuer the knowledge of God and of our selues, are with mutuall knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requirith that first we intreate of the knowledge of God, and after come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selues.

The second Chapter.

What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby we conceiue that there is some God, but also that, whereby we learne so much as behooueth vs to know of him, and as is profitable for his glorie: finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we cannot saie that God is knowen where there is no religion nor godlines. But here I do not yet touch that speciall kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed do conceiue God the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake onely of that first and simple manner of knowledge, wherunto the verie order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, sith mankinde is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be either a father, or author of saluation, or in anie wise fauourable, vnlesse Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towards vs: yet it is one thing to feele that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence gouerne vs, by his goodnesse nourish vs, and endue vs with all kindes of blessings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lorde first simplicie appeareth as well by the making of the worlde, as by the generall doctrine of the Scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the Redeemer: heereupon arise two sorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our minde cannot conceiue the knowledge of God, but that it must giue to him some kinde of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simplicie to know that it is he onely that ought to be honoured and worshipped of all men, vnlesse we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the ende that we should seeke for nothing elsewhere but in him. I meane heereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, so by his infinite power he sustainerh it, by his wisdom he gouerneth it, by his goodnes he preferueth it, and specially mankinde heruleth by his righteousnes and iudgement, suffreth by his mercy, and fauegardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisdom, or of light, or of righteousnes, or of power, or of vprightnes, or of sincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verily, that we should learne to looke for and craue all these things at his hande, and with thanksgiuing account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a meere schoolemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion: Godlines I call a reuerence of God, ioyned with loue of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefits. For men will neuer with willing obedience submit themselves to God, vntill they perceiue that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea, they will neuer yeelde themselves truly and with all their hart wholly to him, vnlesse they assuredly beleue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

2 Therefore they doe but trifle with vaine speculations, which in entreating of this question, do make it their purpose to discuss what thing God is, where it rather behooueth vs to know what maner one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what ende serueth it to confesse as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth onely delight himselfe with idlenes, hauing no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we may haue nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to setue to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reuerence: then that by it guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hande, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy zinde, but that thou must therewithall by and by thinke, that forasmuch

The knowledge whereby we conceiue that there is a God, that he is the creator & preseruer of all things that are, and the only giuer of good things, breedeth godlines and obedience.

How the knowledge of diuers properties of God brought forth diuers vertues in vs.

as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subiect and bound to his authority, that thou owest him thy life, that whatsoeuer thou enterprisest, whatsoeuer thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truly it followeth that thy life is peruerfely corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our lawe to liue by. Againe, thou canst not cleerely see him, but that thou must needs knowe that he is the fountaine and originall of all good things, whereupon should grow both a desire to cleaue vnto him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptnes did not draw his mind from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly minde doth not as by a dreame imagine to herselfe anie God at aduenture, but stedfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doth not falselie forge of him whatsoeuer herselfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, and doth alway with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse she passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the waie. And when she so knoweth him, because she vnderstandeth that he governeth all things, the assuredly trusteth that he is her safe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth herselfe to his faith, because she vnderstandeth that he is the author of all good things: therefore if any thing trouble her, or if she want any thing, by and by she flieth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is perswaded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence she resteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euils to finde readie remedie in his mercifull kindnesse. Because she knoweth him to be her Lord and father, therefore she determineth that he is woorthie that she should in all things haue regard to his authority, reuerence his maiestic, procure the advancement of his glorie, and obey his commandements. Because she seeth that he is a righteous Iudge, and armed with his seueritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his iudgement seate before her eyes, and with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth herselfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is she not so affraid with the feeling of his iudgement, that she woulde conuey herselfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather she doth no lesse loue him, while he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, then while he is beneficiall to the godly, forasmuch as she vnderstandeth that it doth no lesse belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euill dooers, than that he hath rewarde of eternall life for the righteous. Moreover she doth not for onely feare of punishment refraine herselfe from sinning: but because she loueth and reuerenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoreth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet she dreadeth his onely displeasure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, euen faith ioyned with an earnest feare of God, so that feare may containe in it a willing reuerence, and draw with it a right forme of worshipping such as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, because all men generally do worship God, but fewe do reuerence him, while eche where is great pompous shewe in ceremonies, but the purenes of hart is rare to be found.

3 Truly, they that iudge rightly, will alway holde this for certaine, that there is grauen in the mindes of men a certaine feeling of the Godhead, which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this perswasion, that there is a God, is euen from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the verie obstinacie of the wicked is a substantiall witnes, which with their furious struing yet can neuer winde themselves out of the feare of God. Although Diagoras and such other do rest and laugh at all that hath in all ages bene beleued concerning religion: although Dionysius doe scoffe at the heavenly iudgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the woorme of conscience gnaweth them much more sharply than all hot fearing irons. I alleage not this that Cicero saith, that errors by continuance of time grow out of vse, and religion dayly more and more encrease and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we shall haue occasion to shew) traueleth as much as in it lyeth to shake off all knowledge of God, and by all meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dull hardnesse, which the wicked doe desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doth lye pinningly in their hearts, yet the same feeling of God, which they would most of all desire to haue vtterly destroyed, liueth still, and sometime doth vtter it selfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in schooles, but such a one whereof euerie man is a teacher to himselfe euen from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bende all their endeavour to shake it out of their minde. Now, if all men be borne and do liue to this ende, to know God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheth away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is euident, that they all swarue out of kind from the law of their creation, that do not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselues were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likenesse of God, when the soule hauing throughly conceiued the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore uerne aptly doth Grillus reason in Plutarch, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not onely nothing better than brute beasts, but also many waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to so many sorts of euils, they continually draw forth a troublesome vnquiet life: and therefore the worshipping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brute beastes, by which alone they aspire to immortalitie.

In Phedrone & theetoro.

The third Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

WE hold it out of controuersie, that there is in the minde of man, euen by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the ende that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine vnderstanding of his diuine maicstie, the remembrance whereof, with powring in now and then as it were newe drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, nor one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grossest sorts of peoples and fardest from ciuill order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man saith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so sauage, in whom resteth not this perswasion that there is a God. And euen they that in other parts of their life seeme verie little to differ from brute beasts, yet do continually keepe a certaine seede of religion. So thoroughly hath this common principle possessed all mens minds, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bene no countrey, no citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of all men. Yea, and idolatrie it selfe is a substantiall prooffe of this perswasion. For we know how vnwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honour other creatures about himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted perswasion of God is of most great force, which is impossible to be raced out of the minde of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as indeede it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will stoupeth downe euen to the basest creatures to honour God.

Why God hath imprinted some knowledge of his selfe in all mens minds, as that all nations, euen doctores themselves do proue.

Cicero de nat. Deorum.

Yea, they which do most denie it, shew most that it cannot reasonably be denied.

2 Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was deuised by the futtletie and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselues that procured other to worship God, beleued nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I graunt indeed that futtle men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reuerence, and cast them in a feare, to make their mindes the more pliable to obedience: But this they could neuer haue brought to passe, vnlesse the mindes of men had bene alreadie before hand perswaded that there was a God, out of which perswasion as out of seede springeth that readie inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that euen they which futtlely deceiued the simple sort with colour of religion, were themselues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue bene some, and at this day there arise vp many that denie that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We read of none that euer did breake forth into more presumptuous and vnbridled despising of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endeoured to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the verie noise of the falling of a leafe. And whence cometh that, but from the reuengement of Gods maiestie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their consciences as they more labour to flic away from it? They do in deede looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide themselues from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tyed. For howsoeuer sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it out returneth againe, and with new assault doth iun vpon them: so that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which euen while they sleepe do not quietly rest, because they are at euerie moment vexed with horrible and dredfull dreames. Therefore the verie vngodly themselues serue for an example to prouue that there alway liueth in all mens minds some knowledge of God.

The iij. Chapter.

That the same knowledge is either choaked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

The erroneous imagination which superstitious persons haue of God, cannot be excused for that they are the cause of their owne blindnesse.

BVt as experience teacheth that God hath sown the seede of religion in all men, so scarcely may be founde the hundreth man, that hauing it conceiued in his hart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so far is it of that any fruit appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some do offset purpose maliciously revolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So cometh it to passe that there remaineth no true godlinesse in the world. But whereas I said that some by error fall into superstition, I meane not thereby as though their simplicitie might excuse them from blame, because the blindnesse that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proude vanitie, and with stubborneffe. Vanitie and the same ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not chime about themselues as they ought to haue done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshly dulnesse, and also neglecting the sounde maner of searching for him, do curiously flic to vaine speculations. And so they conceiue him not such a one as he offereth himselfe; but do imagine him such a one as of their owne rash presumption they haue forged him. Which gulf being once opened, what way soeuer they flic their feete, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction.

defection. For whatsoever afterward they goe about towards the worshipping or seruice of God, they cannot account it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the deuite of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This peruerfenes doth Paul exprefly touch, where he saith, that they were made foolcs when they cōucted to be wife. He had before said, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobriety, but presumptuously taking vpon themselves more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkenesse vpon them, yea with vaine and forward pride doe make themselves foolcs. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnesse is not excusable, whereof the cause is not onely vaine curiositie, but also a greedines to know more than is meete for them, joynd with a false confidence.

2. As for this that David saith, that the wicked and mad men thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: First that is meant onely of those that choking the light of nature, do of purpose make themselves senselesse, as we shall see againe a little hereafter. Euen as we see that manie after that they haue bene hardened with boldnes and custome of sinning, do furiously put from them all the remembrance of God, which yet is by verie feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their minds. Now David, to make their madnesse the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denyed, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his iudgement and prouidence, they shut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing lesse agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the government of the world, and leaue it to fortune, to winke at the finnes of men, so as they may liue in licentious outrage vnpunished: who soeuer he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly iudgement, doth carelesly follow his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the iust vengeance of God, to draw a fates ouer their hearts, so that the wicked when they haue once closed their eyes, euen in seeing may not see. And David in another place is the best expounder of his owne meaning, where he saith: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Againe, that in their euill doings they proudly reioice at themselves, because they perswade themselves that God doth not looke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they do rob him of his glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot denie himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so is it truely saide, that these men in saying God to be a dead and vaine image, do denie God. Moreover it is to be noted that although they wrastle against their owne naturall feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardnesse can neuer so far preuaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his iudgement seat. But for as much as they are not withholden with any feare from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there reigneth in them a brutish forgetfulness of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcibly carrie them.

Psal. 13. 1.

Malignous sinners are said to thinke there is no God, not as if they did precisely deny him to be, but because they labour to put off from themselves all feeling of his power, which notwithstanding they cannot do.

Psal. 30. 6, 2.

Psal. 10. 11.

2. Tim. 1. 13.

3. So is that vaine defence ouerthrowen, which many are wont to pretende for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any deuotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoeuer it be, though it be neuer so much contrary to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: and that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or fantasie, that may be diuersly fashioned after euery mans liking. And truely we may plainly see with how lying deccits superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching holde of those things in a manner onely, which God hath testified that he careth not for, she either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and saith to be pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoever do set vp newe inuented for mes of worshiping God, they worship and honour their owne doting deuises : because they durst not so trifle with God, vnlesse they had first fained a God, agreeing with the follies of their trailing toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vniuersited and winning opinion of the maiestie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (saith he) yee knewe not God, yee serued them that in nature were no gods. And in another place he saith that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they strayed from the right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from and forsakest the true God: whom when thou hast once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Laetanius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

God alloweth no deuotion but that which springeth from the true knowledge of himselfe.

Ephes. 2.12.

God receiveth not their seruice in such manner as they ferre it vnto ceremonies which we use, because we knowe that there is a reue of the knowledge of God which is before suppressed in them

4 There is also a second fault, that they neither haue at any time any consideration of God, but against their wils, nor do approach toward him, till for all their holding backe they be for cible drawn to him: and euen then also they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maiestie, but onely a seruile and constrained feare, which the iudgment of God wringeth out of them: which iudgment because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithall they abhorre it. And so that saying of Statius, that feare first made gods in the world, may be fitly spoken of vngodlinesse, and of this kinde of vngodlinesse onely. They that haue a minde abhorring from the iustice of God, do hartly wish to haue his throne of iudgement ouerthrowne, which they knowe to stande for punishment of offences against his iustice by which affection they ware against God, who cannot be without his iudgement. But when they vnderstand that his power impossible to be auoided, hangeth ouer them: because they can neither by force remouue it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they feare it. So least they shoulde in all things seeme to despise him, whose maiestie still presseth vpon them, they vse a certaine outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the meane time they cease not to defile themselves with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outrageous mischietes to mischietes, vntill they haue in all points violare the holic law of the Lord, and destroyed his whole rightcoustnes, or at least they are not so holden backe with that fained feare of God, but that they sweetely rest in their finnes, and flatter themselves, and had rather to followe the intemperance of their flesh than restraime it with the bridle of the holy Ghost. But forasmuch as the same is but a void and lying shadow of religion, yea scarcely woorthy to be called a shadow: heereby againe is easily gathered, how much the true godlinesse, which is powred onely into the harts of the faithfull, I meane that out of which religion springeth, doth differ from this confused knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses, to seeme nigh vnto God, whom they flee from. For whereas there ought to haue bene one continuall vnbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their dooings carelessly rebelling against him, labour with a few sacrifices to appease him. Whereas they ought to haue serued him with holinesse of life and syncerenes of hart, they inuent triflings & obseruances of no value, to procure his fauour withal. yea they do the more licentiouslie lie dull in their owne dregges, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propitiatorie satisfactions. Finally whereas their alliance ought to haue bene fastened in him, they neglecting him do rest in themselves, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselves with such a heape of errors, that the darke mist of malice doth choke, and at last vtterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glorie of God. Yet that seede still remaineth which can by no meane be plucked vp by the roote, to beleue that there is a certaine godhead: but the same seede is so corrupted, that it bringeth foorth of it none other but verie euill frutes. Yea thereby is that which I trauaile to prouue more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in the harts of men, forasmuch as the verie reprobate themselves are of necessity enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperitie they pleasantly mocke at God, yea they are full of talke and prating to diminish the greatnes of his power: but if once any desperation touch them, it surreth them vp to seeke the same God, and ministreth them souldaine short praiers: by which it may appeere, that they were not vtterly ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to haue bene vttered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledge of God doth shinningly appeere in the making of the world and in the continuall gouernment thereof.

Moreouer because the furthest end of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicitie should be stopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the mindes of men that seede of religion which we haue spoken of, but also hath so disclosed himselfe in the whole workemanship of the worlde, and daily so manifestly presenteth himselfe, that men cannot open their eyes but they must needs behold him. His substance indeede is incomprehensible, so that his diuine maicstie farre surmounteth all mens senses: but he hath in all his workes grauen certaine markes of his glorie, and those so plaine and notably discernable, that the excuse of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer so grosse and dull witted. Therefore the prophet rightfully crieth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should haue saide, that then he first began to come foorth to be seene in visible apparell, since the time that he first displayed his ensignes in the creation of the worlde, by which euen now what way soeuer we turne our eyes, he appeereth glorious vnto vs. In the same place also the same Prophet aptly compareth the heauens as they be displayed abroad, to his royall paultion: he saith that he hath framed his paltours in the waters, that the cloudes are his chariots, that he rideth vpon the wings of the windes, that the windes and lightnings are his swift messengers. And because the glorie of his power and wisdom doth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his pallace. And first of all, what waie soeuer thou turne thy eyes, there is no peece of the worlde be it neuer so small, wherein are not seene at least some sparkles of his glorie to shine. But as for this most large and beautiful frame, thou canst not with one viewe peruse the wide compass of it, but that thou must needs be on euery side ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth verie well call the ages of the world the spectacle of invisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world scructh vs for a mirrour wherein we may beholde God, which otherwise is invisible. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heavenly creatures a language that all nations vnderstand, for that in them there is a more euident testification of the godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly saith, that there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behoouefull to be known concerning God: because all men without exception, do throughly see his invisible things euen to his verie power and Godhead, which they vnderstand by the creation of the world.

2 As for his woonderful wisdom, there are innumerable prouees both in heauen and in earth that witness it: I meane not onely that secret sort of things, for the nearer marking wherof Astronomie, Physicke, and all naturall Philosophie scruteth, but euen those things that thrust themselves in sight of euery one, euen of the rudest vnlearned man, so that men cannot open their eyes but they must needs be witness

Gods power and Godhead shines so cleere in the world, that it may be seene of all be they neuer so dull.

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

of them. But truly they that haue digested, yea or but tasted the liberal Arts, being holpen by the aide thereof, doe proceede much farther to looke into the secrets of Gods wisdom. Yet is there no man so hindred by lacke of knowledge of those Arts, but that he thoroughly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods works, to bring him in admiration of the workman thereof. As for example to the searching out of the moouings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth Ait and an exact diligence: by which being thoroughly perceived, as the prouidence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is conuenient, that the minde rise somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glorie. But forasmuch as the vnlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the onely helpe of their eyes, cannot be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so generally well ordered and disposed varietie doth of it selfe shew fourth it selfe: it is euident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisdom. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpnes of wit, to wey with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportionall agreement, the beautie, and vse in the frame of mans bodie: but by all mens confession, the body of man doth vtter in verie shewe of it selfe so cunning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be iudged woonderfull.

In 1. b. de vsta part.

Wee neede not seeke farre for the knowledge of God when in our owne faces we may see hu.
Act. 17. 27.

Psal. 8. 5.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in old time did not without cause call man a litle worlde, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnesse and wisdom of God, and containeth in himselfe myracles enough to occupie our mindes, if we will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had said that the verie blinde men may finde out God by groping for him, by and by saith further, that he is not to be sought farre of, because all men do feele vndoubtedly within themselves the heauenly grace wherewith they bee quickened. But if wee need to go no further then our selues, to finde and take holde of God: what pardon shall his slothfulnesse deserue that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to finde God? And the same is the reason why Dauid, when he had proudly spoken in the aduancement of the woonderfull name and honour of God that do euery where gloriously shine, by and by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindfull of him? Againe, Out of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast established strength. For so he pronounceth that not onely in the whole kinde of man is a mirrour of the workes of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breasts, haue tooongs eloquent enough to preach his glorie, so that there needeth no other Orators. And therefore he doubteth not to fit their mouthes in the vaward, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse that would according to their diuclish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul alledgeth out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God: because he garnishing vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euen by common reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truly no man will assentingly and willingly yeeld himselfe to serue God, but he that hauing tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

Act. 17. 28.

* Their vntil whiches is worthe of detestation who ascribe the operations of their bodies and soules in such wise to nature that they vnderstand the power of God which worketh in them.

4 * And here is disclosed the soule vntankfulnes of men, which while they haue within themselves a workehouse gloriously furnished with innumerable workes of God, and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plentie of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praising of him, are contrariwise puffed yp and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how duely in maruclous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great varietie of giftes they possesse by his liberalitie: whether they will or no, they are enforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppress it close within them. Truly they

neede not to goe out of themselves, so that they would not in presumptuously taking vpon themselves that which is giuen from heauen, burie within the ground that which brightly shineth light to their mindes to see God. But euen at this day the earth beareth many monstrous spirits, which sticke not to abuse the whole seide of godhead that is sowne in mans nature, and to imploy it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madnes, that man finding God a hundred times in his body & his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellencie denie that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chaunce made different from brute beastes. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so doe conuicy God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eies euen to the nailes of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare giftes of the soule, doe represent a diuine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes woulde (bearing themselves bold vpon this hie degree) outrageously make war against God. Do the whole treasures of the heauenly wisdomes so meete together, to rule a worme of fvee feete long: and shall the whole vniuersaliue of the world be without this prerogatiue? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the partes of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answer me, what meeting of vriduisible bodies, boyling the meate and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrements and part into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeavouring to doe their office, euen as if so many severall soules did by common aduise rule one bodie.

5 But I haue not now to doe with that stie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being giuen to subtilties, would by crooked conuiciance with that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they binde the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, and with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are far from being inclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertained it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the stars, to learne the greatnes of one, to know what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or that way? I graunt in deede that there is some vse of Astrologie: but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so deepe searching out of heauenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe severall from the bodie. I haue shewed one example, by which it shall be easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truly the manifold varietie of the soule, by which it serueth both heauen and earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, and expelseth each thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniousnesse by which it inuenteth things incredible, and which is the mother of so many marvellous artes, are sure tokens of diuine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleeping it doth not onely toll and iurne it selfe, but also conceiueth many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophecieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shall be of diuine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we forsooth by iudgement that is put into vs discern betweene right and wrong, and shall there be no iudge in heauen? Shall we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of vnderstanding, and shal no God be waking in governing the world? Shall we be so counted the inuenters of so many artes and profitable things, that God shall shall be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from another and not from our selues, all that we haue, is in diuers wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelinesse to the world, it is not onely weake, but also vngodly. They like wel that famous saying of Vergil:

Aen. 6.

*First heauen and earth, and flowing fieldes of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars,
Spirite feedes within, and throughout all the lims,
Infused minde the whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large big bodie mixe it selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beastes,
And liues of flying foules, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A ferie liuelinesse and beaueuly race there is Within those feedes, &c.*

Forfooth, that the worlde which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the Creator of it selfe. So in another place the same author following the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, saith:

Geo. 4.

*Some say that bees haue part of minde diuine,
And beaueuly draughtes. For eke they say that God
Gothe through the coastes of land, and creekes of sea,
And through deepe skie. And hence the flockes and herdes,
And men, and all the kindes of sauage beastes
Each at their birth receiue their sutable liues.
And thereto are they rendered all at last,
And all resolved are returnde againe.
Ne place there is for death: but liuely they,
Flie into number of the stars aboue,
And take their place within the lustrie skie.*

Loe, what that hungrie speculation of the vniuerfall minde that giueth soule and liuelinesse to the world, auaileth to engender and nourish godlinesse in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appeare by the blasphemous sayings of the filthy dog Lucretius, which are deriued from the same principle. Euen this is it, to make a shadowish God, to driue farre away the true God whom we ought to feare and worship. I graunt indeed that this may be godly said, so that it proceede from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an vnproper manner of speech, for as much as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religionesse, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confusedly with the inferiour course of his workes. Let vs therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which so governeth all natures, that his will is to haue vs looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called vpon of vs: because there is nothing more against conueniencie of reason, than for vs to enioy those excellent giftes that fauour of diuine nature in vs, and to despise the author that freely doth giue them vnto vs. Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it for ceably draw vs to consider it, vnlesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his onely word to vphold this infinite masse of heauen and earth, with his onely becke, sometime to shake the heauen with noise of thunders, to burne vp each thing with lightnings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames, sometime to trouble it with diuers sortes of tempests, and by and by the same God when he list in one moment to make faire weather: to holde in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heighth seemeth to threaten continuall destruction to the earth, sometime in horrible wise to raise it vp with outrageous violence of windes, and sometime to appease the waues and make it calme againe. For proofe hereof doe serue all the praises of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, specially in the booke of Iob and in Esay, which now of purpose I ouerpasse, because they shall elswhere haue another place fitter for them, where I shall entreate of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers and they of the household of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these first draughts which both aboue and beneath do as in a shadowe set forth a liuely image of him. And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie. For it must needes be that he from whom all things haue their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himselfe. But now if any man enquire the cause whereby he both was once lead to creat all these things, and is now moued to preferre them: we shall finde that his onely goodnes was it that caused him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the loue of him, for asmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet saith) vpon which his mercie is not powred out.

6 Also in the second sort of his workes, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinary course of nature, there doth appeare no lesse euident proofe of his powers. For in governing the fellowship of men he so ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daly tokens he declareth his fauourable kindnes to the godly, and his seueritie to the wicked and euill doers. For not doubtfull are the punishments that he layeth vpon haynous offences: like as he doth openly shew himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessitie, asswageth and comforteth their sorowes, relieueth their calamities, and by all meanes prouideth for their safetie. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his iustice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euill doers for a time to reioice vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocēt to be tossed with many aduersities, yea and to be oppressed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrarie consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shew of his wrath he punisheth one sinne, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished, we should thereupon thinke that there shall be another iudgement to which they are differred to be then punished. Likewise how great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercie, while he oftentimes ceaseth not to shew his vnwearied bountifullnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, vntill he haue subdued their frowardnes with doing them good?

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in cases past hope, doth suddenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in miserie and in a manner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wildernesse from the wilde beasts, and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministrerth foode to the needie and hungrie, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dungeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in perill of shipwracke safe into the hauen, or healeth the halfe dead of diseases, or scorchet the earth with heat and drinesse, or maketh it fruitfull with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the basest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the high degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed forth, he gathereth that those things which are iudged chances happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specialy of his fatherly kindnesse, and that thereby is giuen matter of reioycing to the godly, and the wicked and reprobate haue their mouths stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errors are blinde in so cleere a place of beholding,

The workes of God in cherishing the good, punishing the wicked, and calling sinners home vnto himselfe, are proofes of his exceeding power and vertue

The goodnes of god is shewed by deliuering men that are in miserie, his strength by overthrowing them that are in glory, his wisdom by disposing all things in strict oportunitie.

ding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdom, wisely to vey these workes of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit that otherwise seeme most cleere sighted. And truly how much soeuer the glorie of God doth apparantlie shine before them, yet scarcely the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power and wisdom are no more hid in darknes: whereof the one, his power, doth notably appeere, when the fierce outrageousness of the wicked being in all mens opinion vnconquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogance tamed, their strongest holdes rased, their weapons and armour broken in peeces, their strengthes subdued, their deuils ouerthrowne, and themselues fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldnes, that auanced it selfe about the heauens is throwen downe euen to the bottome point of the earth againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, and the needie raised from the dunghill, the oppressed and afflicted are drawn out of extreme distresse, men in despaird state are restored to good hope, the vnarmed beare away the victorie from the armed, fewe from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisdom, it selfe sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it disposeth euery thing in fittest opportunitie, confoundeth the wisdom of the worlde be it neuer so pearcing, findeth out the subtile in their subtiltie, finally gouerneth all things by most conuenient order.

Psal. 113. 7.

1. Cor. 3. 19.

The true knowledge of God consisteth not in the curious searching of his nature, but in the inward feeling of his power.

8 We see that it needeth no long, or laboursome demonstration, to fetch out testimonies, to serue for the glorious declaration and prooffe of Gods maieitic: for by these fewe that we haue touched, it appeereth, that which way soeuer a man chance to looke, they are so common and readie that they may bee easily marked with eie, and pointed out with the finger. And heere againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but flie about in the braine, but such as shall be found and fruitfull, if it be rightly conceined and take roote in our harts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we feele within vs, and do enioy the benefits of the m, it must needes be that we be inwardly moued much more liuely with such knowledge, than if we should imagine God to be such an one, of whom we shoulde haue no feeling. Whereby we vnderstand that this is the rightest way and fittest order to seeke God, not to attempt to enter deeply with presumptuous curiositie throughly to discusse his substance, which is rather to be reuerently worshipped than scrupulously searched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himselfe neere and familiar, and doth in a manner communicate himselfe vnto vs. And thus the Apostle ment, when he saide, that God is not to be sought a farr off, forasmuch as he with his most present power dwelleth within euerie one of vs. Wherefore Dauid hauing before confessed his vspeakable greatnes, when he descendeth to the particular rehearfall of his workes, protesteth that the same will thus foorth it selfe. Therefore we also ought to giue our selues into such a searching out of God, as may so holde our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly moue vs with effectuall feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceiue him, it behooueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatnesse, to looke vnto his workes, that we may be refreshed with his goodnesse.

A. 17. 27.

Psal. 145.

In Psal. 144.

The knowledge of those things which here God worketh upon man, doth giue us a taste of that which shall be more fully accomplished in the life to come, especially if we consider his effectuall working vs our selues.

9 Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, and raise vs to hope of the life to come. For when wee consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke, that heerein he doth but make a shew afore hande of those things, whereof the open disclosing and full deliuerance is differred vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by the vngodly greued with afflictions, troubled with iniuries, oppressed with slaunders, and vexed with despitefull dealings and reproches: contrariwise that wicked doers doe flourish, prosper and obtaine quiet with honour, yea, and that unpunished: we must by and by gather that there shall be another life, whicrein is laid vp in store both due reuenge for wickednes, and reward for righteousnes. Moreover when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rods of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much lesse the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For verie well is that spoken of Augustine. If euery sinne should now be punished with open paine, it woulde be thought that nothing were referued to the last iudgement. Again, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euerie particular worke of God, but principally in the vniuersall generalitie of them, the powers of God are set forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankind is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers doe in his workes most brightly appere, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what valour they bee, and to what end we ought to wey them: this we then onely attaine to vnderstand when we discern into our selues, and do consider by what meanes God doth shewe forth in vs his life, wisdom, and power, and doth vse towards vs his righteousnesse, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnesse. For though Dauid iustly complaineth, that the vnbekcing do dote in folly, bicause they wey not the deepe counsailes of God in his gouernance of mankind: yet, that is also most true, which he saith in another place, that the wonderfull wisdom of God in that behalfe exceedeth the haire of our head. But because this point shall hereafter in place conuenient be more largely entreated, therefore I do at this time passe it ouer.

De ciuilei, c. 8.

Psal. 92. 7.

Psal. 40. 13.

10 But with how great brightnesse foecer God doth in the mirrour of his workes shewe by representation both himselfe and his immortal kingdome: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stande dully amazed at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without profic. For, as touching the frame and most beautiful placing of the world, how many a one is there of vs, that when he either listeth vp his eies to heauen, or casteth them about on the diuers cuntries of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest in beholding the works without hauing regard of the workman? But as touching those things that duly happen beside the order of natural course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about and rowled by blinde vnadvisednesse of fortune, then gouerned by prouidence of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding and direction of these things drinen to the consideration of God, (as all men must needes be) yet so soone as we haue without aduisement conceived a feeling of some godhead, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inuentions of our flesh, and with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein in deede we differ one from another, that euery man priuately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wits are subiect, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are indued with singular sharpnesse of vnderstanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewraied their owne dulnesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe ouer all the rest, which are much more vnreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainly erreth in his rounde globe. Now what might not chaunce to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to giue light to the rest, do themselves so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods gouernance of mens matters doth so plainly prouoe his prouidence, that it can not be denied, yet this doth no more preuaile with men, then if they beleued that all things are tossed vp and downe with the rash wil of Fortune: so great is our incli-

God manifesting himselfe, men profit not by it, because they beholde things done without regard to the doer, or they ascribe that to fortune which hee doth, or if they haue some feeling of God, they despise it with dotting fancies, which fault is common vnto all, euen the sharpest witted.

nation to vanitie and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and nor of the common sort, whose madnesse hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

When when they crust to their own wits, become in their opinions concerning God, either vaine, as the Stoikes, and the Ægyptians, or irreligious as the Epicures, or irreso-lute as Symonides.

II Hereof proceedeth that vmeasurable sinke of errors, wherewith the whole world hath been filled and ouerflowen. For each mans wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no maruell that euery seuerall nation was diuersly drawn into seuerall deuises, & not that only, but also that each seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnesse was ioyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath been scarcely at any time any one man founde, that did not forge to himselfe an idoll or fustie in freedde of God. Truly, euen as out of a wide and large spring do issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while euery man ouer licentiously straying, erroneously deuiseeth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not heere to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath bene entangled: because both in so dooing I should neuer haue end, and also though I speake not one worde of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeereth howe horrible is the blindnesse of mans minde. I passe ouer the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pearce into heauen, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoickes seemed in their own conceit to speake very wisely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered diuerse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne insunder. As though we were not alreadie more than enough enclined to vanitie, vnlesse a manifold plentie of gods set before vs, should further and more violently draw vs into error. Also the Ægyptians mysticall science of diuinitie sheweth, that they all diligently endeouored to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceiue the simple & ignorant: but no mortal man euer inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not bene foully corrupted. And this so confuse diuersitie emboldened the Epicures and other grosse despisers of godlines, by litle and litle to cast off all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of al to strue in contrary opinions, they stucke not out of their disagreements, & out of the foolish or apparently erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men do in yaine and fondly procure torments to themselves while they search for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without punishment, because it was better briefly to denie vtrily, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine gods, and so to raise vp contentions that neuer shoulde haue ende. And too much fondly do they reason, or rather cast a miste, to hide their vngodlines by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing shoulde be taken awaie from God. But forasmuch as all do confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned do so much disagree, therupon is gathered that the wits of men are more than dull & blinde in heavenly mysteries, that do so erre in seeking out of God. Some other do praise that answer of Symonides, which being demaunded of king Hieron, what God was, desired to haue a daies respite granted him to study vpon it. And when the next day following, the king demaunded the same question he required two daies respite, and so oftentimes doubling the number of daies at length he answered: How much the more I consider it, so much the harder the matter seemeth vnto me. But granting that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet heereby appeereth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to confused principles to worship an vnknown God.

12 Now we must also hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as al they must needs do that are giuen to their owne opinion) do depart from the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they meane, or what they persuade themselves maketh not much to the matter, sith the holy ghost pronounceth, that all they are Apostates, that according to the darknes of their owne minde do thrust diuels in the place of God. For this reason, Paul pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they had learned by the Gospell, what it was to worship the true God. And we must not thinke this to be spoken of one nation onely, forasmuch as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, since that in the creation of the worlde, the Maiestic of the Creator was disclosed vnto them. And therefore the Scripture, to make place for the true and one onely God, condemneth of falsehood and lying, whatsoever godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueh no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished the peculiar knowledge of God. Truly, among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Christs time seemed to approach nigher to true godlines: and yet we heare it spoken by Christs owne mouth, that they knewe not what they worshipped. Whereupon followeth, that they were deceiued with vaine error. Finallie, although they were not all infected with grosse faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approoued religion that was grounded onely vpon common reason. For albeit, that there were a fewe that were not so mad as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this worlde conceiue not the wisdom of God. Now if the most excellent haue wandered in darknes, what is to be said of the very dregs? Wherefore it is no maruel, if the holy Ghost do refuse as bastard worshippings all formes of worshipping, deuised by the will of men. Because in heauenly mysteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it do not alway breed a heape of erroris, yet is alway the mother of error. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no smal fault, at aduenture, to worship an vnkowne God: of which fault, all they by Christs own mouth are pronounced guiltie, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to say that religion was grounded vpon common consent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherein he willed that euery man should worship gods after the manner of the country, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authoritie to determine that which shalbe summounteth the world: or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receiue without doubting a God deliuered by mans deuise? Euery man rather will stand to his owne iudgement, than yeelde himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake and feeble a bonde of godlines, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a citie or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightned doe shine in the edifice of the world, to shew foorth the glory of the creator, which do so euery way displyaie their beames vpon vs, that yet of themselves they can not bring vs into the right waie. Indeed they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as be choked vp before that they can spread abroad any full brightnes. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the worlde images of things inuisible, saith further, that by faith is perceiued, that they were framed by the word of God, meaning thereby that the inuisible godhead is indeed represented by such shewes, but that we haue no eyes to see the same throughly, vnlesse they be enlightened by the reuelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be knowen concerning God, doeth not meane such a disclosing as may be cōprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth that the same proceedeth

It cannot be true worshipping of God which is grounded onely vpon common reason, custome, or consent of men, being not taught by the law: it is God they ought to worship.

no further but to make them vnexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he saith, that God is not to be sought a far of as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in another place teacheth to what end that needenes an aileth. In the ages past (saith he) God suffered the nations to walke in their owne waies: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, giuing showers and fruitful seasons, filling the harts of men with food and gladnes. Howsoeuer therefore the Lord be not without testimonie, while with his great and manifold bountifullnesse he sweetely allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cease not to follow their owne waies, that is to say, their damnable errors.

uerbeles because it cometh by our owne fault is without excuse.*

14 But although we want naturall power, whereby we cannot climbe vp into the pure and cleere knowledge of God, yet because the fault of our dulnesse is in our selues, therefore all colour of excuse is cut away from vs. For we cannot so pretende ignorance, but that euen our conscience doth still condemne vs of slouthfulness and vnthankfulness. It is a defence forsooth right worthie to be receiued, if man will alledge that he wanted eares to heare the truth, for the publishing where of the verie dumbe creatures haue loude voices: if man shall say that hee cannot see those things with his eies, which the creatures without eies do shew him: if man shall laie for his excuse the feeblenes of his wize, where all creatures without reason do instruct him: Wherefore sith all things do shew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandring and straying out of the way. But howsoeuer it is to be imputed to the fault of men, that they do by and by corrupt the seede of the knowledge of God, sowne in their mindes by manuellous workmanship of nature, so that it groweth not to good and cleane fruite: yet it is most true, that we are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple testimonie, that the creatures do honorablie declare of Gods glorie. For so soone as we haue taken by the beholding of the world a small taste of the godhead, we leauing the true God do in stead of him raise vp dreams and fancies of our owne braine, and do conuey hither and thither from the true fountaine the praise of righteousnes, wisdom, goodnes and power. Moreover we do so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, depraue his daily doings, that we take awaie both from them their glorie, and from the author his due praise.

The vi. Chapter.

This, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and mistresse.

*The true creator is gouernor of the world cannot perfectly be knowne without the wordes, which meane, God hath used ever sithens
the beginning, to instruct his people by.*

T Herefore, although that same brightnes, which both in heauen & earth shineth in the eies of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednes of men, euen so as God, to wrap all mankind in one guiltinesse, doth shew his diuine maiestie to all without exception as it were portraied out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that we haue also another and a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his worde, that thereby he might be knowne to saluation. And this prerogative he hath vouchsafed to giue vs, whom it pleased him more neerely and more familiarly to draw together to himselfe. For because he saw the mindes of all men to be caried about with wandering and vntedfast motion, after he had choson the I. ues to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with baeres, that they shoulde not wander out in vaine as other did. And not without cause he holdeth vs with the same mean in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise euen they shoulde quicklie swaue away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of ocher. For as olde men, or purblind, or they whose eies are dimly sighted, if you laie a faire booke before them, though they perceue that there is somewhat written therein, yet can they not reade two wordes together: but being holpen with spectacles set

betweene them and it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our mindes the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remooue the mist, and plainly shew vs the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church God vseth not onely dumme teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithall pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worship: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth himselfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to giue them also his word. Which is the righter and certainer make to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, and the rest of the fathers by this help attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were severally different from the vnbeleeuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, where-with they were enlightened into the hope of eternall life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needfull for them to know God not only to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubtles they obtained both by the word. For that kind of knowledge whereby was giuen to vnderstand who is the God by whom the world was made and is governed, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge edioyned, which onely quickneth dead soules, whereby God is known not only to be the maker of the world & the only auctor & iudge of all things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the covenant whereby God hath adopted to himselfe the children of Abraham, & of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithfull haue alway bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine markes severally discerned from the counterfeit multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shall conueniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall allcage many testimonies out of the newe Testament, and some also out of the law and the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this end, to prooue that in the scripture is disclosed vnto vs God the creator of the world, and in the scripture is set forth what we ought to thinke of him, to the end that we should not seeke about the bush for an vncertaine godhead.

2. But whether God were known to the fathers by oracles and visions, or whether by the mean & ministracion of men he informed them of that which they should know from hand to hand deliuer to their posteritie: yet it is vndoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engrauen a stedfast certaintie of doctrine, so as they might be persuaded & vnderstand, that it which they had leained came from God. For God alwaies made vndoubted assurance for credit of his word, which far exceeded all vncertaine opinion. At length that by continuall proceeding of doctrine, the truth shining in all ages might still remaine in the worlde, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to haue as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this intent was the law published, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expositors. For though there were diuers vses of the law, as hereafter shall better appeare in place conuenient: and specially the principall purpose of Moses, and all the Prophets was to teach the manner of reconciliation between God and man, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediator, the Scripture doth by certaine marks and tokens paint out the only & true God, in that that he hath created and doth gouerne the world, to the ende he should be severally known and not reckned in the false number of fained gods. Therefore although it behooueth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the workes of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them; yet principally ought he to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit thereby. And therefore it is no maruall dulnes, because very few of them do giue themselves pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather reioyce in their owne vanitie. Thus then ought we to holde, that to the ende true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any taste but it neuer so little of true and sound doctrine, vnlesse he haue bene scholar to the Scripture. And from hence groweth the originall of true vnderstanding, that we reuerently embrace whatsoever it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not onely the perfect and in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledg of God springeth from obedience. And truly in this behalfe God of his singular prouidence hath provided for men in and for all ages.

3 For if we consider how slipperie an inclination mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulness of God, how great a readines to fall into all kinde of errors, howe great a lust to forge oftentimes new and counterfeit religions, we may thereby perceiue how necessarie it was to haue the heavenly doctrine to put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vaine by error, or be corrupted by boldnesse of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alway vsed the helpe of his worde, toward all those whom it pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because hee foresaw that his image imprinted in the most beautifull forme of the worlde was not sufficiently effectually: Therefore it behooueth vs to trauell this straight way, if we earnestly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is well & liuely set out by his workes, when his workes be weyed not after the perversenes of our own iudgement, but according to the rule of the eternal truth. If we swaue from that word, as I said euen now, although we run neuer so fast; yet we shall neuer attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must thinke, that the brightnes of the face of God, which the Apottle calleth such as cannot be attained vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which we cannot vnwrap our felues, vnlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to run neuer so fast in another. And therefore Dauid oftentimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the worlde, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himselfe a lawfull government: because errors can neuer be rooted out of the harts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4 Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glorie of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the workes of his handes, that the orderly succeeding course of daies and nights preacheth his maiestic, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The law of the Lord (saith he) is vndefiled conuerting soules: the witnes of the Lord is faithfull, giuing wisdom to little ones: the righteousnes of the Lord are vpriight, making harts cheerefull, the commandement of the Lord is bright, giuing light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the lawe, yet in generalitie he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen & earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the 29. Psalm, where the Prophet hauing preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, showers, winde, & stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountains to tremble, and breaketh the Cedar trees: in the end at last he goeth further & saith, that his praises are sung in the sanctuarie, because the vnbe-

And in like maner in another Psalme, after that he had described the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus concludeth: thy testimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holines for euer. And out of this mearing also proceeded that which Christ saide to the woman of Samaria, that her nation & the rest did honor that which they knew not, & that only the Iewes did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feeblenes thereof can by no mean attain vnto God, but being holpen & lifted vp by his holy word, it followed of necessitie, that all men, except the Iewes, did wander in vanitie and error, bicause they sought God without his word.

The vij. Chapter.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witnessse of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

BVt before I goe any further, it is needfull to say somewhat of the authoritie of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens minds to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set forth, there is no man of so desperate boldnesse, vnlesse he be voide of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speaketh it. But bicause there are not daily oracles giuen from heauen, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased him to preferue his truth to perpetuall memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credite among the faithful, but in that they do beleue that it is as verily come from heauen, as if they heard the luey voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeed is right worthie both to be largely entreated of and diligently weyed. But the readers shall pardon me if herein I rather regard what the proportion of the worke which I haue begun may beare, then what the largenesse of the matter requireth. There is growne vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authoritie as by common consent of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuiolable truth of God did rest vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy Ghost, they aske of vs who can assure vs that these Scriptures came from God: or who can ascertain vs that they haue continued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently receiued, and that other to be striken out of the number of Scripture, vnlesse the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? It hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, and what bookes are to be reckened in the canon thereof. So these robbers of Gods honour, while they seeke vnder colour of the Church to bring in an vnbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they snare both themselues and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleued among the simple, that the Church can do all things. But if it be so: what shall become of the poore consciences that seeke stedfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine thereof stande and bee staid onely vpon the iudgement of men? When they receiue such answer, shall they cease to wauer and tremble? Again, to what scornes of the vngodly is our faith made subiect? into how great suspition with all men is it brought, if this be beleued, that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the fauour of men?

The credit of the Scripture doth not depend vpon the churches receiving and authorizing of it.

2 But such babblers are well confuted euen with one worde of the Apostle. He testifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundation of the Prophets & Apostles.

Eph. 2. 20. The Church depending vpon the Scripture, doth not by her testimonie give it credit, but because it hath an evidence of cer-tainie with it it selfe, doth therefore of diuine ac-

If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needs be, that the same doctrine stood in stedfast certaintie, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well caull, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtfull what is to be saide of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the iudgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets and preaching of the Apostles: wherofeuer that doctrine shall be found, the allowed credit therof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had neuer been. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuse, that the Church hath power to iudge the scripture, so as the certaintie of the scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore, when the Church doth receiue the scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should be in controuersie, make it autentike and of credit: but because she acknowledgeth it to be the truth of her God, according to her duetie of Godlinesse without delay she doth honor it. Whereas they demand, how shall we be perswaded that it came from God, vnlesse we resort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should aske, how shall we learne to knowe light from darkenes, white from blacke, or sweete from bitter. For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no lesse apparant sense of her truth, than white and blacke things do of their colour, or sweet and bitter things of taste.

3 I know that they commonly alleage the saying of Augustine, where he saith that he would not beleue the Gospell, saue that the authoritie of the Church moued him thereto. But how vntruly and caullously it is alleaged for such a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is easie to perceiue. He had to do with the Manichees, which required to be beleued without gainsaying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their side, but proued it not. And to make their Manichees to be beleued, they pretended the Gospell. Now Augustine asketh them what they would do, if they did light vpon a man that would not beleue the Gospell it selfe, with what maner of perswasion they would draw him to their opinion. Afterward he saith: I my selfe would not beleue the Gospell, &c. saue that the authoritie of the Church moued me thereto. Meaning that he himselfe, when he was a stranger from the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the Gospell for the assured truth of God, but by this, that he was overcome with the authoritie of the church. And what maruell is it, if a man not yet knowing Christ, haue regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the church, nor meaneth that the certaintie of the gospel doth hang thereupon: but simply and only, that there should be no assurcednes of the gospel to the infidels, whereby they might be won to Christ, vnlesse the consent of the Church did driue them vnto it. And the same meaning a litle before he doth plainly confirme in this saying. When I shall praise that which I beleue, and scorne that which thou beleuest, what thinkest thou meete for vs to iudge, or do? but that we forsake such men as first call vs to come and know certaine truths, and after command vs to beleue things vncertaine: and that we follow them that require vs first to beleue that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strong by beleuing, we may attaine to vnderstand the thing that we beleue: not men now, but God himselfe inwardly strengthening & giuing light to our mind. These are the verie words of Augustine: whereby euery man may easily gather, that the holy man had not this meaning: to hang the credit that we haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awardment of the Church, but onely to shew this, (which we our selues also do confesse to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the spirite of God, are brought by the reuerence of the Church vnto a willingnes to be taught, so as they can finde in their hearts to learne the faith of Christ by the Gospell: and that thus by this means the authoritie of the Church

Church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleue the Gospell. For, as we see, his minde is that the assurance of the godly be staid vpon a far other foundation. Otherwise I doe not denie but that he often presseth the Manichies with the consent of the whole Church, when he seeketh to prooue the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproched Fauslus for that he did not yeeld himselfe to the truth of the Gospell so grounded, so stablished, so gloriously renowned and from the very time of the Apostles by certaine successions perpetually comended. But he neuer traueleth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But onely this, which made much for him in the matter that he disputed of, he bringeth forth the vniuersall iudgement of the Church, wherein he had the aduantage of his aduersaries. If any desire a fuller prooffe hereof, let him reade his booke concerning the profite of beleeuing. Where he shall finde that there is no other readinesse of beleefe commended vnto vs by him, but that which onely giueth vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a conuenient beginning to inquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and found truth.

4 We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credite of this doctrine, is not established in vs, vntill such time as we be vndoubtedly perswaded that God is the author thereof. Therefore the principall prooffe of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apostles boast not of their owne sharpe wit or any such things as procure credite to men that speake: neither stande they vpon prooves by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compell the whole world to obedience. Now we haue to see how not onely by probable opinion, but by apparant truth it is euident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we wil prouide wcl for consciences, that they be not continually carried about with vnstedfast doubting, nor may waiver, nor stay at euerie small stop, this maner of perswasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, iudgements or the coniectures of men, euen from the secret testimony of the holy Ghost. True in deed it is, that if we list to worke by way of arguments, many things might be alledged that may easily prooue, if there be any God in heauen, that the lawe, the prophecies and the Gospell came from him. Yea, although men learned and of deepe iudgement would stand vp to the contrarie, and would employ and thew forth the whole force of their wits in this disputation: yet if they be not so hardened as to become desperately thamelesse, they would be compelled to confesse, that there are seene in the Scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appeere that the doctrine thereof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shall see, that all the bookes of the holy scripture do far excell all other writings whatsoeuer they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eyes & vn-corrupted senses, we shall forthwith finde there the maicstie of God, which thal subdue all hardnes of gainfaying, and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they doe disorderly, that by disputation trauell to establish the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truly although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the most subtile despisers of God, that haue a desire to shew themselves wirtie and pleasant in feebling the authoritie of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for me to put to silence their bablings. And if it were profitable to spend labour in confuting their caullations, I would with no great businesse shake in sunder the brags that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliuer the sound worde of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not foorthwith to fasten in their hearts that assurednesse that godlinesse requireth. Phrophe men because they thinke religion standeth onely in opinion, to the ende they would beleue nothing fondly or lightly, doe couet and require to haue it prooued to them by reason, that Moses and the Prophet spake from God. But I answer, that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as onely God is a conuenient witness of himselfe in his owne word, so shall the same word neuer finde credit in the harts of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward witness of the holy Ghost. It behooueth therefore of necessitie that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophets, do enter into our harts to perswade vs, that they faithfully vttered that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly set forth by Esai in these words: My spirit which is in thee, and the wordes that I haue put in thy mouth, and in the mouth of thy seede, shall not faile for euer. It greueth some good men, that they haue not ready at hand some cleere prooffe to alleage, when the wicked doe without punishment murmure against the worde of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seale and a pledge, because vntill he do lighten mens mindes, they do alway wauer among many doubtings.

5 Let this therefore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwardly taught, do wholly rest vpon the Scripture, and that the same Scripture is to be credited for it selfe sake, and ought not to bee made subiect to demonstration and reasons: but yet the certentie which it getteth among vs, it attaineth by the witness of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely maiestie of it selfe it procureth reuerence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it thoroughly pearceth our affections, when it is sealed in our harts by the holy Ghost. So being lightened by his vertue, we do then beleue, not by our owne iudgement, or other mens, that the scripture is from God: but about all mans iudgement we hold it most certainly determined, euen as if we beheld the maiestie of God himselfe there present, that by the ministerie of men it came to vs from the very mouth of God. Wee seeke not for arguments and likelihoods to rest our iudgement vpon: but as to a thing without all compass of consideration, we submit our iudgement and wit vnto it. And that not in such sort as some are wont sometime hastily to take hold of a thing vnknown, which after being thoroughly perceiued displeaseth them: but because we are in our consciences well assured that we hold an inuincible truth. Neither in such sort, as silly men are wont to yeeld their minde in thraldome to superstitions, but because we vndoubtedly perceiue therein the strength and breathing of the diuine maiestie, wherewith we are drawn and stirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more liuely and effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophets with the whole people do beare hi a witness, because being taught by prophecies they did vndoubtedly beleue without guile or vncertainty that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our perswasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, euen such a one, wherein the minde more assuredly and stedfastly resteth, than vpon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceed but by reuelation from heauen. I speake now of none other thing but that which euery one of the faithfull doeth by experience finde in himselfe, sauing that my words do much want of a full declaration of it. I leaue heere many things vnspoken, because there will be elsewhere againe a conuenient place to entreat of this matter. Onely now let vs know, that onely that is the true faith which the spirit of God doth seale in our harts. Yea with this onely reason will the sober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Esay promisseth, that all the children of the renued church shall be the schollers of God. A singular priuiledge therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect onely, whom he seuereth from all the rest of mankind. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cheerefulness to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses, as it is written: Say not in thy hart, who shall ascend into heauen, or who shall descend into the deepe? the worde is euen in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of vnderstanding be laide vp in store for his children, it is no maruel nor vnlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seene such ignorance and dullnesse. The common multitude I call euen the most excellent of them, vntill such time as they be graffed into the bodie of the church. Moreouer Esay giuing warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible, not onely to strangers but also to the Iewes that would be accounted of the household of God, addeth this reason: because the arme of God shall not be reueiled to all men. So oft therefore as the smalnes of number of the beleeuers doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

The viij. Chapter.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proofes to establish the credit of Scripture.

VNlesse we haue this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any iudgement of man, in vaine shall the authoritie of Scripture either be strengthened with arguments, or established with consent of the church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For vnlesse this foundation be laide, it still remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, we haue embraced it deuoutly, and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become very fit helpes, which before were but of small force to graffe and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is maruellous, howe great establishment groweth heereof, when with earnest studie we consider howe orderly and well framed a disposition of the diuine wisdom appeereth therein, howe heavenly a doctrine in euery place of it, and nothing fauoring of earthlinesse, howe beautifull an agreement of all the partes among themselues, and such other things as auile to procure a maiestie to writings. But more perfectly are our harts confirmed when we consider, howe we are euen violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of words. For this also was not done without the singular prouidence of God, that the hie mysteries of the heavenly kingdome should for the most part be vttered vnder a contemptible basenesse of wordes, least if it had bene beautified with more glorious speech, the wicked should cauilt that the onely force of eloquence doth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doth raise vp a greater reuerence of it selfe then any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we iudge, but that there is a more mightie strength of truth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any Art of wordes? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to prooue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wisdom, because his preaching among them was set foorth not with enticing speech of mans wisdom, but in plaine euidence of the spirit and of power. For the truth is then set free from all doubting, when not vpholden by foraine aides it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But howe this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, heereby appeereth, that of all the writings of men, bee they neuer so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affections. Reade Demosthenes or Cicero, reade Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I grant they shall maruellously allure, delite, mooue, and rauish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely mooue thy affections, it shall so pearce thy hart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacy of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in maner vanish away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: do in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie.

The scripture being once deuoutly embraced, wee are afterwards the more established by considering the diuine destination, maiestie & agreement which is in it, and the force which it hath in our minds through the dignitie of matter, not grace of wordes.

a beautifull phrase of speech, so as their eloquence giuerh not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shew that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and grosse style. But whether a man read Dauid, Esay, and such like, who haue a sweete and pleasant flowing speech, or Amos, the Heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke fauouereh of countrey rudenes: in cuerie one of them shall appeere that maiestie of the holy Ghost that I speake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfai- ter of God, that with deceitfull resemblance he might the better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he craftily spred abroad with rude and in manner barbarous speech those wicked errorrs wherewith he deceiued silly men; and hath oftentimes vsed discontinued phrases, that vnder such visor he might hide his deceits. But howe vaine and vnclenly is that curious counterfai- ting, all men that haue but meane vnderstand- ing do plainly see. As for the holy Scripture, although forwarde men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceiued by man. Let all the Prophets be looked vpon, there shall not one be founde among them, but hee hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in such sort that those are to be thought, to haue no iudgement of taste to whom their doctrine is vsuauorie.

3 Other men haue largely entreated of this argument, wherfore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a few things, that chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Beside these points that I haue already touched, the very antiquitie of the Scripture is of great weight. For howsoeuer the Greeke writers tell manie fables of the Ægyptian diuinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Moses. And Moses deuifeth not a new God, but fetterh forth the same thing which the Israelites had received in long processe of time, conuoced to them by their fathers as it were from hande to hande concerning the euerlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the co- uenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing neuer heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needs be that the deliurance from bondage, wherein they were detained, was a thing well and commonly knowne among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did forthwith raise vp all their mindes. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC yeeres. Nowe it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the originall deli- uerance of his doctrine: howe much the holie Scripture then is beyonde all other writings in antiquitie?

4 Vnlesse perhaps some list to beleuee the Ægyptians, that stretch their aunci- entie to sixe thousand yeeres before the creation of the worlde. But sith their vaine babbling hath bene alway scorned euen of all the prophane writers themselves, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Appion, alleageth testimonies woorthie to be remembered out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath been famous euen from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truly known. Now, that neither there should remaine to the malicious any cause of suspition, nor to the wicked any occasion to cauil, God hath for both these dangers provided good remedies. When Moses rehearseth what Iacob almost three hundred yeeres before had by heauenly inspiration pronounced vpon his owne posteritie, how doth he set forth his owne tribe? yea, in the person of Leui he spotteth it with eternall infamie. Symeon (saith he) and Leui the vessels of wickednesse. My soule come not into their coun- sell, nor my toong into their secret. Truelie, hee might haue passed ouer that blot with silence, in so doing not onelie to please his Father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole familie with part of the same shame. How can that writer bee suspected, which vnconstrainedlie publishing, by the oracle of the holy Ghost, Ghost, that the principall auncester of the familie whereof himselfe descended was an abominable doer, neither priuately prouided for his owne honor, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kinsmen, whom vndoubtedly this matter greeued? When also he rehearteth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his own brother, and Maria his sister: shall we saie that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holie Ghost? Moreover, sith himselfe was hieft in authoritie, why did he not leaue at least the office of the hie priefthoode to his owne sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touch heere onely a fewe things of many. Put in the lawe it selfe a man shal each where meete with many arguments that are able to bring full prooffe to make men beleue that Moses without all question cometh from heauen as an Angell of God.

5 Now these so many and so notable myracles that hee recounteth, are euen as many establishments of the law that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was carried in a cloude vp into the mountaine: that there euen to the fortieth day he continued without companie of men: that in the verie publishing of the lawe his face did shine as it were beset with sunne beames: that lightnings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard each where in the aire: that a trumpet sounded being not blowen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude let betweene, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so myraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore, Dathan, and Abron, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke striken with a rod did by and by powre foorth a riuer: that at his praier it rained Manna from heauen: did not God heerein commend him from heauen as an vndoubted Prophet? If any man object against me, that I take these things as confused, which are not out of controuersie, it is easie to answer this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assemblie published all these things, what place was there to faime before those witnesses that had themselues seene the things done? It is likely forsooth that he woulde come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelitie, stubbornes, ynthankfulnesse, and other finnes, woulde haue boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne fight with such myracles, which indeed they neuer sawe.

6 For this is also woorthie to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any myracles, hee therewithall odiously ioyneth such things as might stirre the whole people to cry out against him, if there had bene neuer so little occasion Whereby appeereth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but bicause they were euer more than sufficiently conuincid by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier known, than that the prophane coulde denie that myracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them another cauillation, saying, that they were done by Magicall arts and forcerie. But what like prooffe haue they to accuse him for a forcerer, which so far abhorred from such superstition, that he commandeth to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsell of forcerers and soothsaiers? Truly no such deceiver vseth his iuggling casts, but that he studieth to amaze the minds of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth onely execute those things that God hath appointed, hee doth sufficiently wipe away all blots of thinking euill of him. Nowe if the things themselues be considered, what enchantment coulde bring to passe, that Manna daily raining from heauen, shoulde suffice to feede the people? And if anie man kept in store more than his iust measure, by the verie rotting thereof he shoulde be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great prooues God suffred his seruant so to be tried, that nowe the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people prouddie and impudently make inurrections, sometime dauers of them conspiring among themselues went about to ouerthrowe the holie seruant of God: how

7 Moreover where he assigneth the chiefe gouernement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarch Iacob, who can denie that this was done by spirite of propheticie, specially if we wey in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it prooued true? Imagine Moses to haue been the first author of this propheticie: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed fower hundred yeeres wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome should rest in the tribe of Beniamin. When Dauid was annointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritance of the kingdome should be changed? who would haue looked that there should haue come a king out of the base house of a heardman? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour should light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this annointment was gouerned by any arte, trauell or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heauenly propheticie? Likewise those things that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkly, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the couenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeeres after, doe they not make it plaine, that he spake by the inspiration of God? I ouerskip his other tellings aforhand of things, which doe so evidently saour of the reuelation of God, that all men that haue their sound wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleere looking glasse, wherein God evidently appeereth.

8 But in the other Prophets the same is yet also much more plainly seene. I will choose out only a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdome of Iuda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esaiæ propheticie of the destruction of the citie and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine ynough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such things as at that time seemed false, and afterward prooued true: yet those propheticies that he vttereth concerning their deliuerance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whome the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more then an hundred yeeres from the time that Esaiæ so propheticied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundred yeere or thereabouts after the death of Esaiæ. No man could then gesse that there should be any such Cyrus, that should haue warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subiect so mightie a monarchie vnder his dominion, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Israel. Doeth not this bare telling without any garnishment of wordes evidently shewe, that the things that Esaiæ speaketh, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and not the coniectures of men? Againe, when Ieremie a little before that the people were caried away, did determine the ende of the captiuitie within three score and ten yeeres, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needs be that his toong was gouerned by the spirit of God? What shamelesnesse shall it be to denie, that the credite of the Prophets was stablished by such prooues, and that the same thing was fulfilled in deede, which they themselues doe report to make their sayings to be beleueed? Behold, the former things are come to passe, and new things doe I declare: before they come foorth, I tell you of them. I leaue to speake howe Ieremie and Ezechiel being so farre asunder, yet propheticying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endyted the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing propheticies of things to come for the space of sixe hundred yeeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an historie of things already done and commonly known? These things if godly men haue well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine prooffe hereof is too cleere to be subiect to any caullations at all.

9 I know what some learned men doe prate in corners, to shew the quicknes of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they demand, who hath assured vs that these things which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moses & the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardie to moue this question, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero: who would not say, that such madnesse were worthie to be corrected with strokes and stripes? The lawe of Moses hath bene maruellously preferred, rather by heavenly prouidence then by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priestes it lay buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly king Iosias found it, it hath stul by continual succession from age to age bin vfed in the hands of men. Neither did Iosias bring it forth as an vknown or new thing, but such a thing as had bene euer commonly published, and wherof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records. Only this had happened, that the Priestes had ceased to publish the law according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselves had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had Dauid in their hands, knew they no: of Moses? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certain that their writings came to posteritie none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeres deliuered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, and partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

10 As for that which they object out of the historie of the Machabees, to minish the credit of scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deuised more fit to stablish the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon themselves the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commaunded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that we now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they coulde so soone be made? It is euident, that after the crueltie appeafed they were immediatly abroade againe, and were without controuersie knownen to be the same of all godly men, that hauing been brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly know them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conspired together, did insolently triumph with reproches vpon the Iewes, yet neuer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For whatsoeuer they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the author of it. What then doe these praters elie, but bewray their owne more then doggish frowardnesse, while they falsly say, that these bookes are changed, and new put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approoued by consent of all histories? But to spende no more labour vaine in confuting such foolish caullations: let vs rather hereby consider howe great a care God had for the preservation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men he saved it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endued the godly priestes and other with so great constancie, that they stucked not to redeeme this booke euen with losse of their life if neede were, and so to conuey it ouer to posteritie: that he disappointed the narrow search of so many gouernours and souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable and miraculous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thoughte to haue been vtterly destroyed, by and by came abroade againe as fully restored, and that with a great deale more honour? For by and by followed the translating of them into Greeke, to publish them throughout the world. And not in this onely appeared the miraculous working, that God preserved the tables of his covenant from the bloudie proclamations of Antiochus: but also that amongst so manifold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a few and wasted, and last of all, brought in manner to utter destruction, yet they remained still safe & extant. The Hebrue toong lay not only vnesteemed, but almost vnknown. And surely had not bene Gods pleasure to haue his religion provided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Iewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarred from the naturall vse of their mother toong, appeareth by the Prophets that liued in that age, which is therefore woorthie to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the law and the Prophets is the more plainly perceued. And by whom hath God preserved for vs the doctrine of saluation contained in the lawe and the Prophets, to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? euen by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, the Iewes whome Saint Augustine doeth therefore woorthily call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian church, because they haue ministred vnto vs that thing, to reade whereof, themselves haue no vse.

The mysteries which the three Euangelists deliuer in simple speech, shew the adoring maiestie of Iohs, the rude education of the Apostles before they became teachers, S. Pauls crueltie against Christians before he taught Christianitie, the doctrine of the new Testaments from the contempt of prophane men.

Now if we come to the newe Testaments, with how sound pillars is the truth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelists write the historie in base and simple speech. Many proude men doe loath that simplicitie, because they take no heede to the chiefe pointes of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they intreate of heauenly mysteries about mans capacitie. Surely whosoeuer hath but one drop of honest shame will be ashamed if they reade the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly comprised by these three Euangelists, doe easily deliuer their writing from all contempt. But Iohn thundering from an high, those whome he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbornesse more mightily then any thunderbolt. Nowe let come foorth all these sharpened faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them reade Iohns Gospell: Will they or no, they shall there finde a thousande sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to restraime their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blinde, yet the very heauenly maiestie in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doth sufficiently aduance their doctrine aboue the world, that Matthew being before all giuen to the gaine of his monee boorde, Peter and Iohn brought vp in their fisher boates, all grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paul, not onely from a professed, but also from a euell and bloudie enimie conuerted to a new man, with sudden and vnhoped change doth shew, that being compelled by heauenly authoritie, he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogs denie, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredit the historie: yet still the truth it selfe openly crieth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the rascall people, suddenly began to gloriously to intreate of heauenly mysteries.

No small estimation groweth to the scripture of the generall and common agreement of men, in holding consent and credit therunto becometh.

12 There be yet also furthermore many verie good reasons, why the consent of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the wils of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And that howsoeuer Satan with all the worlde hath traueiled by maruelous meanes, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrowe it, or vterly to blot and deface it out: of mens remembrance, yet euer still like a palme tree, it hath risen vp above, and remained inuincible. For there hath not lightly bene in olde time any sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellent wit than other, but he hath bent his force against this Scripture: yet they all haue nothing preuailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, and yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How coulde it haue resisted being so mightily on each side assailed, if it had had none other defence but mans? Yea, rather it is hereby prooued, that it came from God himselfe, that all the trauels of men struiuing against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen vp. Beside that, not one cite alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receiue and imbrace it: but so faire as the world extendeth in length and breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of diuers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so diuers and disageeing in manner in all things else, ought much to inouoe vs, because it appeereth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heavenly maiestie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I meane not of them all, but onely of those, with whom as with lightes it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assurednesse of minde ought we to submit vs to that doctrine which we see established and witnessed with the blood of so many holy men? They when they had but once received it, stuck not boldly without feare, yea and with great cheerefulnessse to die for it: how should it then come to passe, that we hauing it conueied to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and vniouoeable perswasion take hold of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath bene sealed with the blood of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witness of their faith: and not of a frankie distemperance of braine, as sometime the erroneous spirits are woont to doe, but with a firme & constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maketh, not onely ascertained vnto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtilities of cauilers, yet be they such as be not of themselves sufficiently available to bring steadfast credite vnto it, vntill the heavenly father disclosing therein his maiestie, doth bring the reuerence thereof out of all controuersie. Wherefore then onely the Scripture shall suffice to that knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certaintie thereof shall be grounded vpon the inward perswasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as second helpes of our weaknesse they follow that chiefe and highest testimonie. But they do fondly that will haue it periwaded by prooffe to the vnfaithfull, that the Scripture is the word of God, which cannot be knowen but by faith. For good reason therefore doth Augustine giue warning, that godlines and peace of minde ought to go before, to make a man vnderstand somewhat of so great matters.

The dignitie of scripture not a little ascertained by the constant sufferings of so many that haue sealed it with their blood.

The ix. Chapter.

That those fanaticall men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, do ouerthrow all the principles of godlinesse.

Now they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with erreur, as to be carried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirite, both themselves doe forsake all reading, and also doe scorne their simplicitie which still follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I woulde faine knowe of these men, what letter that is, by whose inspiration they are carried vp so high, that they dare despise the doctrine of the scriptures as childish and base. For if they answer that it is the spirit of Christ, then such carelesnesse is woorthie to be laughed at. For I thinke they will grant, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitiue Church were lightened with none other spirit. But none of them did learne of that spirit to despise the word of God: but rather euery one was moued more to reuerence it, as their writings doe most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretolde by the mouth of Esaie. For where he saith: My spirit that is vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the olde people to the outward doctrine, as though they were set to learne to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true and perfect felicitie of the new Church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, then by the spirit of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewde men with wicked sacriledge doe seuer afunder those things that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inuioable knot. Moreouer, Paul being rauished vp into the third heauen, yet ceased not to goe forward in the doctrine of the lawe and the Prophets, euen so as he exhortheth Timothee, a doctour of singular excellencie to applie reading. And woorthie is that commendation to be remembered, wherewith he setteth fourth the scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprove, that the seruants of God may be made perfect. How diucllith a madnesse is it to saie, that the vse of Scripture is but transitorie, and lasteth but for a while: which in deede guideth the children of God euen to the last ende? Againe, I would haue them answer me this: whether they haue tasted of another spirit then that which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not carried with such giddinesse, that they daie so boast. But what maner of spirit did he speake of in his promise? euen that spirit which should not speake of it selfe, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those things, which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his word. It is not therefore the office of the spirit, which is promised vs, to saie newe and vheard-of reuelations, or to coyne a new kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospell, but to scale in our mindes the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospell.

2. Whereby we plainly vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to applie the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we list to take any vse and fruite of the spirit of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedefull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to haue giuen place after the rising of the light of the Gospell. On the other side, if any spirit leauing the wisdom of the worde of God doeth thrust vnto vs another doctrine, that the same spirit ought rightfully to be suspected of vanitie and lying. For what? when Sathan transformeth himselfe into an angell of light, what credite shall the holy Ghost haue among vs, if it be not seuerally knowen by some assured marke? And truely it hath bene plainly pointed out vnto vs by the worde of the Lorde, but that these miserable men doe willingly couet to erre to their owne destruction, while they seeke a spirit rather from themselves than from him. But (say they) it is dishonorable, that the spirit of God, whom all things ought to obey, should be subiect to the Scripture. As if this were a dishonour to the holie Ghost to be euery where egall and like to it selfe, to agree with it selfe in all things, and no where to varie. In deede, if it were to be tried by the rule either of men, or of Angels, or any others rule whatsoeuer, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if ye list so to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it selfe, when it is considered in it selfe, who can therefore say, that there is any wrong done vnto it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleasure to haue his maiestie established. It ought to content vs so soone as he enreth into vs. But least vnder his name the spirit of Satan should creep in, he will haue vs to knowe him by that image of himselfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. He is the author of the Scriptures: he cannot be diuers and vnlike himselfe. Therefore it must needs be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed himselfe therein. This is no dishonor vnto him, vnlesse perhaps wee count it honorable to swarue and goe out of kinde from himselfe.

3 Whereas they cauil that we rest vpon the letter that slaieth, heerein they suffer punishment for despising of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paul there contendeth against the false Apostles, which commending the law without Christ did call away the people from the benefite of the new Testament, wherin the Lord doth couenant that he will graue his law within the bowels of the faithfull, and write it in their harts. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killeth the Readers of it, when it is seuered from the grace of Christ, and not touching the hart, onely foundeth in the eares. But if it be effectually printed in our harts by the holy ghost, if it present Christ vnto vs: then is it the worde of life, conuerting soules, giuing wisdom to little ones, &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the ministerie of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so sticke fast in his truth which he hath expressed in the Scriptures, that then onely he putteth forth and displaieth his force, when the Scripture hath her due reuerence and dignitie. And it disagreeeth not heere with which I before saide, that the worde it selfe is not much assured vnto vs, vnlesse it be confirmed by the witnesse of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuall knot the Lorde hath coupled together the assurance of his worde and of his spirit, so that perfect reuerence to the worde doth then settle in our mindes when the holy Ghost shineth vpon vs to make vs therein behold the face of God: and on the other side without all feare of being deceiued we doe embrace the holic Ghost, when we reknowledge him in his owne image, that is, in his word. Thus it is vndoubtedly: God brought not abroad his word among men for a sodaine shew, meaning at the coming of his spirit by and by to take it away againe, but he after sent the same spirit with whose power he had distributed his worde, to make an end of his worke with effectuall confirmation of his worde. In this sort Christ opened the mindes of the two disciples, not that they should cast awaie the Scriptures and waxe wise of themselves, but that they should vnderstand the Scriptures. Likewise Paul when he exhorteth the Thessalonians not to extinguishe the spirit, doth nor carrie them vp on high to vaine speculations without the worde, but by and by faith further, that prophecies are not to be despised: whereby without doubt is ment, that the light of the spirit is choked vp so soone as prophecies come to be despised. What say these proudly swelling men; ranshed with the spirit, to these things, which reckon this onely to be an excellent illumination, when carelessly forsaking and saying farewell to the word of God, they both boldly and rashly do take holde of all that they haue conceiued in their sleepe? Truly, a faire other sobrietie becommeth the children of God: which as they see that without the spirit of God they are void of all light of truth, so do they know that the word is the instrument wherewith the Lorde distributeth to the faithfull the light of his spirit. For they knowe none other spirit but that which dwelt and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the worde.

2. Cor. 3. 6.
As the scripture is a dead letter which we read, it, having not the life of the spirit, so the spirit is a dangerous guide if we follow it, leaving the conscience of the scripture: they must go hand in hand, each assuring and warning other.

The x. Chapter.

That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

BUt because we haue shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the worlde and all the creatures is somewhat plainelie set forth, is yet more familiarly familiarly and plainly declared in the worde: now is it good to consider, whether the Lord shew himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his workes. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point vnto it, whereby the godly mindes being admonished, may knowe what is chiefly to bee searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I do not yet touch the peculiar couenant, whereby God seuered the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For euen then he appeared the redeemer in receiuing to his children by free adoption those that before were enimies. But we are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creation of the world, and ascendeth not to Christ the mediator. And although by and by it shall be good to alleage certaine places out of the newe Testament, forasmuch as euen out of it both the power of God the Creator and his prouidence in preferuing of the first nature is approoued, yet I warne the Readers before, what is now my purpose to do, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heauen and earth doth gouerne the worlde by him created. Euerie where is renoumed both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his seueritie, which shewe him to bee a righteous punisher of wicked dooings, specially where his sufferance nothing preuaileth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions, wherein his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seene. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to vnderstand of God. The Lorde (saith he) the Lorde, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keepeth mercy vnto thousands, which takeft away iniquitie and wicked dooings, before whom the innocent shal not be innocent, which rendrest the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeating of that honourable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not whv he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stande in a liuelie feeling, than in an emptie and supernaturall speculation. And here we do heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen & earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercie, iustice, iudgement and truth. For might and power are contained vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addiion doe the Prophets set him forth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, becaute I woulde not heape vpp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalmee suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his vtues is so exactly reckened vs, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly doe we perceiue God by information of experience, to be such as he declarth himselfe in his worde. In Jeremie where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. Hce that glorieth, saith he, let him glorie in this that he knoweth me to be the Lorde that doth mercie, iustice, and iudgement on the earth. Surely these three things are very necessarie for vs to know: Mercie, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Iudgement, which is daily executed vpon euill doers, and more greuous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Iustice; whereby the faithfull are preferred and most tenderly chearished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophcie saith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou maist glory in God. And yet heere are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how shoulde the knowledge stande sure which is heere required of his iustice, mercie and iudgement, vnlesse it did rest vpon his vnmoueeable truth? And howe shoulde we beleue that he doth gouerne the earth with iustice and iudgement, but vnderstanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodnesse? If then all his waies be mercie, iudgement and iustice, in them must holinesse also needes be seene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge of God that is set foorth vnto vs in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeereth imprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the ende we may learne first to honour him with perfect innocencie of life and vnfained obedience, and then to hang altogether vpon his goodnesse.

3 But here I meane to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct vs to the true God, doth expresselic exclude, and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath bene corrupted. True it is indeede that the name of one God was euery where knowne and renoumed. For euen they that worshipped a great number of gods, so oft as they did speak according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iustine the martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engrauen in the hearts of all men. The same thing also doth Tertullian prouue by the common phrase of speech. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawn or fallen to false forged deuises, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that euer they naturally vnderstood of the being but one God, auailed no further, but to make them inexcusable. For euen the wisest of them do plainly shewe the wandring error of their minde, when they wish some god to asist them, and so in their praiers do cal vpon vncertaine gods. Moreouer in this that they imagined God to haue manie natures, although they thought somewhat lesse absurdly than the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerua and other: yet were they not free from the deceits of Satan, & as we haue already saide elsewhere, whatsoeuer waies of escape the Philosophers haue suttile inuented, they cannot purge themselves of rebellion, but that they all haue corrupted the truth of God. For this reason Habacuc after he had condemned al idols, biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admit him to be any other than such as he had disclosed himselfe by his worde.

Howsoeuer the name of one God was knowne amongst the Gentiles, their knowledge of him hath bene abraies so corrupted, that the scripture directing to the true God, giveth speciall warning of theirs as false.

Ab. 2.

The xj. Chapter.

That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, and that generally they forsake God, so manie as doe erect to themselves any images.

BVt as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and grosse wit of man, vseth to speake after the common manner: so when it meaneth to make seuerally knowne the true God from the false Gods, it cheefely compareth him with idols: not that it doth allowe these inuentions that are more suttly and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlier to disclose the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madnesse in seeking God so long as they cleaue euerie one to their owne imaginati- ons. Therefore that exclusiue definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that maner of godhead, that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the onely conuenient witnes of himselfe. In the mean time, sith this brutish grossenes hath possessed the whole world, to couet visible shaps of God, and so to forge themselves gods of timber, stone, gold, siluer, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to holde this principle, that with wicked faithhood the glorie of God is corrupted, to oft as any shape is faimed to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glory of his deitie to himselfe

The Scripture is of no one thing more carefull than lest men corrupt the glorie of God, first by concealing, and then by expressing him vnder any shape or similitude.

Cap. 11. Of the knowledge of alone, meaning to teach vs what maner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediarely: Thou shalt make thee no grauen image, nor any similitude, in which words he restraineth our liberty, that we attempt not to represent him with any visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the formes wherewith of long time before, superstition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sun, yea, and so many stars as the foolish nations saw in the skie, so many gods they fained them. And scarce was there any liuing creature which was not among the Ægyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser then the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meere to be vsed, but without any exception he reiecteth all images, pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to haue God neere vnto them.

2 This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which he ioyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou hearest a voice, but thou sawest no bodie. Therefore take heed to thy self, least peradventure thou be deceiued and make to thy selfe any likeness, &c. We see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfeit shapcs, that we may knowe that they forsake God whosocuer do cōuet to haue visible formes of him. Of the Prophets onely Isay shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much heereof, to teach that the maiestie of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish counterfaying, when he beeing without bodie, is likened to bodily matter: being inuisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lump of timber, stone or golde. In like manner reasoneth Paul: For as much as we are the generation of G O D, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone grauen by art and the inuention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoever images are erected, or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simply displease him as certaine dishonors of his maiestic. And what maruell is it if the holy Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the verie wretched and blind Idolaters themselves to confesse this in earth: It is known how Seneca complained as it is to read in Augustine. They dedicate (saith he) the holy immortal and inuolable Gods in most vile and base stuffe, and put vpon them the shapes of men and beafts, and some of them with kind of man and woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, & such they cal Gods, which if they should receiue breath & meet them, would be reckoned monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fond causation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenienses when he confuted their error in counterfaying a shape of God.

3 God indeede, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath giuen a presence of his godhead, so as he was saide to be beholden face to face, but all these signes that cuer he shewed, did aptly serue for meanes to teach, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloude and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glorie, yet did they as it were bridle and restrain the minds of men, that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore, not Moses himselfe, to whom God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by praier to see that face, but receiued this answer, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared vnder the likeness of a Dove, but sith he immediatly vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleue him to be an inuisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the reueiling that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselues a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercie seate whercin God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made, as it might teach that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens mindes are carried beyond themselves with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroad did couer it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set farre inward, did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is verie plaine that they be verie madde, that goe about to defend the images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shewe that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? for as much as they were made for this purpose, that hiding the mercie seat with their wings, they should not onely keepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it, that the Prophets described the Seraphins shewed them in a vision, with their face vncovered: whereby they signifie, that so great is the brightnesse of the glorie of God, that the Angels themselves are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawen from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly iudge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom we nowe speake, pertayned onely to the olde manner of introduction, as it were of children, vsed in the lawe. So to drawe them nowe for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudiments were appointed. And it is much shame, that the panime writers are better expounders of the law of God than the Papists are. Iuuenal reprocheth the Iewes, as it were in scorne, that they honor the white clouds and the deitie of heauen. I grant he speaketh puerilly and wickedly: and yet he speaketh more truly in saying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papistes do which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hotte hastines, brake out oftentimes to seeke them idols, euen as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatrie, lest throwing vpon the Iewes the blame of that fault which is common to all, we sleepe a deadly sleepe vnder vaine allurements to sinne.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying: The idols of the Gentiles are gold and siluer, euen the workes of mens hands. Because the Prophet doth gather of the stuffe it selfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or siluer image: and he taketh it for confessed truth, that it is a foolish faimed inuention whatsoever we conceiue of our owne sense concerning God. He nameth rather gold & siluer, than clay or stone, that the beautie or the price should not serue rather to bring a reuerence to idols. But he concludeth generally, that nothing is lesse allowable, than gods to be made of dead stuffe. And in the meane while he standeth as much vpon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a rashnes, which themselves bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vanish away at euerie moment, yet dare giue the honor of God to idols. Man must needs confesse that himself is but a creature of a daies continuance, & yet he wil haue a peece of mettall to be counted God, to which himself gaue the beginning to be a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the wil of men? Very iustly doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt:

*I was sometime a fig tree log, a blocke that serud for nought:
The workman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A fourme to sit vpon, or els a Priap God to be.
At length he thought the better was a God to make of me.*

Cap. I I. Of the knowledge of

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner euerie moment, by his workmanship shall conuey the name and honour of God to a dead stocke. But forasmuch as Epicure in scoffingly iesting hath cared for no religion, let vs leaue the taunts of him and such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet prick vs, or rather thrust vs through where he saith, that they are too much beauly witted that with one selfe piece of wood do make a fire and warme themselves, do heat the oven to bake bread, do rost or seeth flesh, & do make them a God before which they fall down humbly to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they haue not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse conuenient than to bring God to the measure of sive foote, which is about al measure and incomprehensible. And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custom sheweth to be natural to men. We must percouer hold in mind, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speech, that they are the workes of mens hand which want the authoritie of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men do deuise of themselves are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are indued with vnderstanding, that they should know that all things are moued with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead and senselesse. But because the corruption of nature carrieth as well all nations, as each man priuately to so great madnes, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them, and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond subtletie of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they do more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeeth an image not only to be made by the grauer, but also to be counterfayted by any other workman, because such counterfaying is euil and to the dishonor of his maiestie.

5 I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregorie had bene taught, he would neuer so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly saith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoever men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophets reprove them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papists take for an assured principle, that images are in freedde of bookes. For they do in comparison set images against God as things directly contrarie, and such as neuer can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alleaged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Iewes did worship, it is amisse and fallly done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceiued, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally, if it were not true that it is a deceitfull and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I win of them when we shew that it is vanitie and lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophets haue taught.

6 Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius haue written of this matter, which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine, which without doubting pronounceth that it is vallowful not only to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet saith he none other thing but the same which many yeeres before was decreed by the Elibertine Councell, whereof this is the xxxvj. Chapter. It is ordeined that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honored and worshipped be not painted on the walles. But most notable is that which in another place Augustine alleageeth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both tooke away the feare of God, and brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peradventure it should be but of small authoritie. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darknesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmeet for the maiestie of God, because they diminish the feare of God, and encrease error in men. The prooffe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truly than wisely spoken. But Augustine hauing borrow ed it of Varro, bringeth it forth as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, encreased by the. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore diminished or rather taken away thereby, because his maiestie may easily in the foolishnes, & in the fond & absurd forging of images grow to contempt. Which second thing I woulde to God we did not by proof find to be so true. Whosocuer therefore wil couet to be rightly taught, let him elswhere learne that of images, what is meet to be known concerning God.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes haue any shame, let them no more vse this shift to say that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet should they not much get thereby for defence of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well known. The pictures and images that they dedicate to saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot and vnclannesse, wherunto if any woulde fashion himselfe, he were woorthie to be beaten with staues? Surely, the brothelhouses can shew harlots more chastely and soberly attyred, than their temples shewe images of these whom they would haue called virgins. Euen as vncomely array giue they to the Martyrs. Let them therefore fashion their idols at least to som honest giue of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lie in saying, that they are the books of some holines. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithfull people in holy places, whom God woulde haue there instructed with far other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his worde & in his holy mysteries: wherunto they shew themselves to haue a munde not verie heedfull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papistes call lay & vnlearned men whose vnskillfulnes may bear to be taught only by images? Forsooth euen those whom the Lord knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom he vouchsafeth to reueile the heauenly wisdome, whom he willet to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdom. I grant indeed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I praie you groweth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which onely was meete to instruct them with: For it is for no other cause, that they which had the cure of churches gaue ouer their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dumb. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospel, painted out in a maner crucified before our eyes. To what purpose then were it to haue commonly set vp in churches so many crosses of woode, stone, silver and golde, if this were well and faithfully beaten into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curse vpon the crosse, to cleanse our sinnes with the sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his blood, and finally to reconcile vs to God the Father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the couetous do set their mindes & eyes faster vpon the golden & silver crosses, the countesaying of God by imagery condemned as a thing which diminisheth his feare, and bringeth his glory into contempt. Concil. Elibert. cap. 6. & ca. 31. Li. 4. De ciuit. dei cap. 9. & 31.

If the images which Papistes propose as buket of holines, are not paterines of vnclannesse as they are yet are they no fit means to instruct the people of God, before whom Christ should rather be painted by teaching, than taught by painting.

Sap. 14. 15.

Imagery is ancient and springeth from the ancient roote of infidelitie, men not beleeuing or not considering God to be present, vnlesse they haue some visible signe for aduers sensement of his presence.

Gen. 31. 19.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of wise dome, that they were the first authors of them, which gaue this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I grant that this euill custome was very ancient, and I deny not that it was the firebrand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatrie, did more and more burne therein. Yet doe I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischief. For it appeareth by Moses that images were vsed before that this curiositie in dedicating the images of dead men, wherof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in vre. When he telleth that Rachel had stolen her fathers idols, hee speaketh it as of a common fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continuall worship of idols. After the generall flood, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many yeeres but that men according to their owne lust faigned them gods. And it is likely that the holie Patriarch yet liuing, his childrens children were giuen to idolatry, so that to his bitter grieffe he sawe the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible iudgement. For Thare and Nachor euen before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Iosue testifieth. Seeing the generation of Sem so soone swarued, what shall we iudge of the posteritie of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride & rash boldnes, presumeth to imagin god according to hir own conceit: & as it is possessed with dulnes, yea, ouerwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceiueth vanitie and a sonde fantasie in steed of God. And in these euils is added a new mischief, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a god as he inwardly conceiueth. Thus the minde begetteth the idoll, & the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites proueth that this was the beginning of idolatrie, that men do not beleeu that God is among them, vnles he shew himself carnally present. We know not (said they) what is becom of this Moses: make vs gods that may go before vs. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not beleeue that he was nie vnto them, vnlesse they did see with their eies a corporall representation of his face to be a wittnes vnto them of the God that gouerned them. Their minde was therefore to knowe by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfeir deuise like it selfe, wherein it may vainly delight as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages since the creation of the worlde, men to obey this blinde desire haue erected signes wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnall eies.

Iof. 2. 4. 2.

From making images to represent God, men were brought first to thinke that his presence was restrained vnto those images, then to imagine th. & there was some diuine thing in them. & at length flaily to worship them.

9 After such inuention forged, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in thē. At length being both with mindes and eies altogether fastned thereon, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and haue them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeereth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were perswaded in some grosse opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou fallest downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lorde hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expresse a likenesse of him, but also anie titles or stones to be dedicated, that shoulde stande to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the lawe, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soone as they haue forged a visible forme for God, they also tie the power of God vnto it. So beastly foolish are men, that there they fasten fasten God where they counterfeit him, and therefore must they needs worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idole, or God in the idole. This is alway idolatrie, when honors due to God are giuen to an idole, vnder what colour soeuer it be. And because God will not be worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoeuer is giuen to idols is taken from him. Let them take heed hereunto that seeke for pretences to defend the abhominable idolatrie, wherewith these manie ages past, true religion hath bene drowned and ouerthrowne. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes themselves so vnadvised to forget that it was God by whose hands they had bene brought out of Ægypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron saide, that those were the gods by whom they were deliuered out of the land of Ægypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God that was their deliuerer, so that they might see him go before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleued that the hea:hen were so grosse as to beleuee, that God was no other thing but stocks & stones. For they changed their images at their pleasur, but still they kept the same gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images saie them many gods. Besides that they did daily consecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine saith were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common sort answered, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deitie that did in it inuisible dwell. And they that were of somewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worship the image, nor the spirit in it, but by the corporall image they did behold the signe of that thing which they ought to worship? Howe then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the Gentiles were none otherwise minded than as I haue saide: being not contented with a spirit: all vnderstanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure and neerer imprinted in them. After þnce that such disordered counterfeiting of God well liked them, they neuer ended, till daily more and more deluded with new deceits, they imagined that God did shew forth his power in images. And neuer the lesse, both the Iewes were perswaded that vnder such images they did worship the one true Lord of heauen and earth: and likewise the Gentiles, their false gods, whom yet they fained to dwell in heauen.

In Psal. 113.

10 Who soeuer denie that it hath thus bene done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lie. For, why fall they downe before them? And when they praise, why turne they towards them as to the eares of God? For it is true that Augustine saith, that no man praiech or worshippeth when he so beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in minde, that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will do for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference betweene the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reuerence or none done to it, they honour another solemnly? Why do they wearie thei selues with vowed pilgrimages to visite those images whereof they haue like at home? Why doe they at this day in defence of them as it were for their religion and countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort as they would better suffer to haue the one onely god than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I do not recken vp the grosse errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and do in manner possesse the harts of all men. I do onely shew what themselves do confesse when they meane most of al to excuse themselves of idolatrie. We do not call them (say they) our gods. No more did the Iewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets each where cease not to cast in their teeth their fornication with stocks and stones, for dooing no more but such things as are daily done by them that would be counted Christians, that is to saie, that they carnally worshipped God in stocks and stones.

Cap. II. Of the knowledge of

The difference that they put betwene themselves and idolaters, is but a shift. They are not acquitted from the same sin because they give it another name.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to passe it ouer, as if I knew it not, how they seeke to escape with a more subtle distinction, whereof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretende that the worship which they giue to images, is Idolodulia, which is seruice of images, and not Idololatria which is worship of images. For so they terme it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, giue vnto images and pictures that worship which they call Doulia, or seruice. And so they thinke themselues without blame, if they be but the seruants and not also the worshippers of idoles: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worship then to serue. And yet while they seeke a hole to hide them in the Greeke word, they childishly disagree with themselues. For seeing Latreuin in Greeke signifieth nothing but to worship, their saying commeth but to this effect, as if they would say, that they worship in deede their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seeke to catch them in wordes: but they themselues, while they seeke to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, doe bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be neuer so eloquent, they shall not attaine by their eloquence to prooue vnto vs that one selfesame thing is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shew me a difference in the thing it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape guiltinesse of his fault, by giuing his sinne a new deuised name: so it is a very absurditie to thinke that these men be quit by new deuise of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whom they themselues are compelled to condemne. But so far are they from proouing that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole mischief is an vnorderly counterfeiting, wherein they haue strived with them while both with their owne wit they deuise, and with their owne hands they frame them signifying formes to expresse them a fashion of God.

Images, whether they be of stories, or onely of bodies may be both made and used, so that they be not made to represent God, nor otherwise abused when they are made.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffered at all. But forasmuch as caruing and painting are the giftes of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vsed. Let these things which God hath giuen vs for his glorie and for our owne benefite, be not onely defiled by disordered abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. We thinke it vnlawfull to haue God fashioned out in visible forme, because himselfe hath forbidden it, and because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glorie. And lest they thinke that it is onely we that are in this opinion, they that haue bene trauelled in their works, shall finde that all sound writers did alway reprove the same thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse shall it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that onely those things be painted and grauen whereof our eyes are capable: but that the maiestic of God which is farre above the sense of our eyes, be not abused with vncomely deuised shapes. Of this sort are partly histories and things done, partly images and fashions of bodies, without expressing of any things done by them. The first of these haue som vse in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profite the second can bring saue onely delectation, I see not. And yet it is euident, that euen such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stand vp in churches. Whereby we may iudge that they were there set vp not by discreet iudgement or choise, but by foolish and vnadvised desire. I speake not howe much amisse and vncomely they were for the most part fashioned, nor how licentious Painters and Caruers haue in this point shewed their wantonnesse, which thing I haue already touched. Onely I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet doe they nothing auale to teach.

Images dangerous and vsfe to be in Churches.

13 But leauing also that difference, let vs by the way consider whether it be expedient in Christian temples to haue any images at all, that do expresse either things done or the bodies of men. First, if the authoritie of the ancient Church doe any thing thing mooue vs, let vs remember that for about fūe hundred yeeres together, while religion yet better flourished, and sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian Churches were vniuersally without images. So they were then first brought in for the garnishment of churches, when the sinceritie of ministracion was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them that were the first authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swarued from that vprihtines of them that were without images. What? do we think that those holy fathers would haue suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they iudged profitable and good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, & much danger to lurk vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose & aduisedly reiect it, then by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in expresse words testify: When they be set in such places (saith Epist. 49. he) honorably on hie, to be seene of them that pray and doe sacrifice, although they want both sense and life, yet with the very likenes that they haue of liuely members and senses, they so moue the weake minds, that they seeme to liue & breath, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doth worke and in maner enforce thus much, that the mind liuing within a body doth thinke that body to haue sense, which he seeth like vnto his owne. And a little after: Images do more auale to bow downe an vnhappy soule, by this that they haue mouth, eyes, eares, & feete, than to amend it by this that they neither speak, nor see, nor heare, nor go. This truly seemeth to be the cause why Iohn willed vs to beware not onely of worshipping of images, but also of images themselues. And we haue found it too much in experience, that through the horrible madnes which hath heretofore possessed the world, to the destructiō in maner of al godlines, so soone as images be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatrie, because the folly of men cannot refrain it selfe, but it must forthwith run on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much danger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vse temples are ordained, me thinks it is very ill beseeing the holmes therof, to receiue any other images than these liuely and natural images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrate. I meane Baptisme and the Lords supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eies ought both more earnestly to be occupied and more liuely to be moued, than that they should neede any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo this is the incomparable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompenced, if we beleue the Papists.

14 I think I had spoken ynough of this thing already, but that the *Nice*ne Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speake more. I meane not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eight hundred yeeres ago, by the commandement & authoritie of Irene the empressic. For that Synode decreed, that images should not onely be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatioeuer I should say, the authoritie of the Synode would make a great prejudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much moue mee, as make it appeere to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images then became Christians. But first let vs dispatch this. They that at this day maintaine the vse of images, alledge the decree of that *Nice*ne Synode for their defence. But there is extant a booke of confutation bearing the name of Charles the Great, which by the phrase we may gather to haue bene written at the same time. Therin are recited the sentences of the Bishops that were present at that Councell, and the arguments wherewith they contended. Iohn the Legate of the East partes saide: God created man after his owne image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to haue images. The same man thought that images were commended vnto vs in this sentence: Shew me thy face because it is beautifull. Another to prooue that images ought to be set vpon altars, cited this testimonie: no man lighteth a candle and putteth it vnder a bushell. Another, to shew that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought forth a verse out of the Psalme: the light of thy countenance is sealed vpon vs. Another tooke this similitude: As the Patriarches vsed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men haue the images of Saints in steede of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose haue they writted this saying: Lord, I haue loued the beautie of thy house. But specially wittie is the exposition of this place: As we haue heard so haue we seene, that God is not known by onely hearing of his word, but also by looking vpon images. Like is the sharpe deuise of Bishop Theodore. Maruellous (saith he) is God in his Saints. And in another place: In the Saints that are in the earth: therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, so filthie are their vsfauourie follies that it grieueth me to rehearse them.

Their arguments brought for prooffe that they might be worshipped.

15 When they talke of the worshipping: then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharao, and of the rod of Ioseph, and of the pillar that Iacob set vp. Albeit in this last example, they doe not onely depraue the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seeme to them maruellous strong and meete prooues. Worship his footesteole. Againe, worship on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scorne put the personage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greater and grosser follies? But to put all out of doubt, Theodosius Bishop of Mira, doth so earnestly confirme by the dreames of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heauen to shew for it. Now let the fauourers of images go and presse vs with the decree of that Synode. As though those reuerend fathers doe not altogether diseredit themselves, in either so childishly handling, or so vngodly and sowlly tearing the Scriptures.

Honour, and the same honor giuen by that Synod vnto images which is due vnto God himselfe.

16 Now come I to those monstrous impieties, which it is maruell that euer they durst vomit, and twise maruellous that they were not cried out against with hie decession of all men. And it is good that this outrageously wicked madnes be bewraied, that at least the false colour of antiquitie may be taken away, which the Papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Amorium pronounceth curse against all them that will not haue images worshipped. Another imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the East part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophets, the Apostles and Martyrs woorthie to suffer in whose time there were no images? They adde further. If the Emperors image be met with perfume and censing: much more is this honour due to the images of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Cyprus, professeth that he reuerently imbraceth images, and affirmeth that he will giue to them the same honourable manner of worship that is due to the Trinitie that giueth life. And whosoever refuseth so to doe, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And, that ye should not thinke that this was the priuate sentence of one man, they did all assent vnto it. Yea, Iohn the Legate of the East partes being further carried with heate, saide it were better to bring all brothell houses into the citie, then to denie the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all heretikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemne farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and reioice that hauing the image of Christ do offer sacrifice vnto it. Where is now the distinction of Latria and Dulia, wherewith they are wont to seeke to blinde the eies both of God and men? For the councill without any exception doth giue euen as much vnto images as vnto the liuing God himselfe.

The xij. Chapter.

That God is generally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

WE said in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shall be in other places more largely set forth. Now I doe but shortly repeate, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striueth not for the bare name of God, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the godhead, be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeereth what pure religion doth differ from superstition. Eusebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway euen the blinde themselves groping in darkenesse haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God be not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly and well deriueeth from relegere, to record, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre fet, that good worshippers did often recorde and diligently wey what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a contrarie to wandering libertie, because the greater part of the world vnaduisedly taketh holde of that which they first meete withall, and flieth about hither and hither: but true godlinesse, to the ende it may stande in stedfast state, Relegit, that is to say, doth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Like as I thinke superstition to haue her name hereof, that not being contented, with the manner and order prescribed, she heapeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leaue the words, it hath alway been agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errors corrupted and peruerted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, when with vndiscreete zeale they giue themselves leaue to do all things. And although this confession found in the mouches of all men: yet herein a shamefull ignorance bewraith it selfe, that neither they cleaue to the one God, nor haue any regarde of order in the worshipping of him, as we haue already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is ieaious, and that he will be a seuerer reuenger if he be mingled with any fained god. And then he setteth forth the lawfull maner of worshipping, to holde mankind in obedience. He conteineth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he onely may be their lawmaker: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses and ends thereof are manie, I will intreate in place fit for it. Now I onely touch this point, that thereby men are bridleed that they run not out of the way to wrong worshippings. Now, as I first said, we must hold in minde, that if all that euer properly belongeth to Godhead doe not rest in God alone, he is spoiled of his honour, and his worship broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what subtleties superstition deceiueth. For it doth not so reuolt vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forsake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but whilest he granteth vnto him the highest place, he setteth round about him a number of lesier gods, among whom he diuideth his offices. And so (albeit clokely and craftily) the glorie of the Godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the olde time, as well they of the Iewes as of the Gentiles did set beneath the father and iudge of gods a great route of gods which should euery one according to his degree in common haue with the highest God the gouernment of the heauen and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduanced to the fellowship of God to be worshipped, called vpon, and honored in stead of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the maiestie of God is not so much as diuided, when in deede it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, sauing that we retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme power: and in the meane time deceiued with entangled subtleties, we are fundrely carried to diuers gods.

True religion cleaueeth to one set frame of worshipping one God, and him alone. Superstitio; though it make but one God the chiefest, doth neuer thelesse diuide his honour amongst many.
2. de nat. deorum.

2 For this purpose also was inuented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme and fond.

terme them, that is worship and seruice, whereby they might freely seeme to giue away the honors of God to Angels and dead men. For it is euident, that the worship which the Papistes giue vnto Saints, differeth nothing in deede from the worship of God. For all alike without diuersitie they worship both God and them: sauing that when they be charged with it, they winde away with this exception, that they keepe still for God the honour that is due vnto him inuolate, because they leaue vnto him the worship that they call Latria. But sith the question standeth vpon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them so carelesly to mock in a matter of all matters most weighty? But to let that also passe, yet win they nothing by this distinction, but to prooue, that they giue worship to one God, and seruice to another. For Latria in Greeke signifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in English worship. Dulia, properly signifieth seruice. And yet sometime in Scripture this difference is cōfounded together without diuersitie. But graunt it be a perpetuall difference, then must we search what both the words may meane. Dulia is seruice, Latria is worship. Now no man doubteth that to serue, is more than to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare to serue him whom he would not sticke to worship. So is it an vnequall dealing, to giue to the saints that which is the greater, and to leaue to God that which is the lesse. But many of the ancient authors haue vsed this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men do perceiue it to be not only vnfit, but altogether verie fond?

Gal. 4. 8.

Though ciuill honor may be done vnto men, yet all religious not onely worship but seruice also, yea, and all diuifull beuours of godlines are so due vnto God alone, that they cannot without impietie be made common vnto any other.

Mat. 4. 10.

Reu. 19. 10.

3. Now leauing nice subtleties, let vs wey the matter it selfe. When Paul putteth the Galathians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he saith that they gaue Duliam seruice to those that of nature were no gods. Although he name Latriam or worship, is therefore their superstition excusable? He doth neuerthelessse condemne their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia seruice, than if he had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repelleth the assault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is writtē, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Sathan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angell reprooued Iohn, because he fell down on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that Iohn was so mad that he would giue vnto the Angel the honor that was due only to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is ioyned with religion fauoureth somewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glorie of God. We read indeed often, that men haue bene honoured: but that was a ciuill honour, as I may so call it. But religion hath another rule, which so soone as it is ioyned with worshippe, bringeth with it a prophane abuse of the honour of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profited in godlinesse, but that hee had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore, when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worship him in the steede of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to do that which he did. And why so? but because men do neuer so narrowly put difference betweene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diuersitie they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we must remember that nothing be it neuer so litle must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zacharie when he preacheth of the repairing of the church, in plaine words expresth: That there shall not only be one God, but also that there shall be one name of that god, to the end that he haue nothing in common with idols, What maner of worship God requireth, we shall see in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his law to prescribe vnto men what is lawfull and right, and so to bind them to a certaine rule, that euerie man should not giue himselfe leaue to deuise what forme of worship he list. But because it is not expedient to loade the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touch that point yet.

Zac. 14. 9.

Onely let it suffice for this time to keepe in minde, that eury carrying away of the dutifull behauiours of godlinesse to any other than to God alone, is not without ob-berie of God. And first superstition deuised to giue diuine honours to the Sunne, or other stars or idoles: then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoiles taken from God, presumed to prophane all that euer was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honor the soueraigne deitie, yet grew it in vse indifferently to offer sacrifices to spirites, lesser gods, or dead men of honour. So slipperie is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number that which God seuerely challengeth to himselfe alone.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That there is in the Scriptures one essence of God from the verie creation, which essence containeth in it three persons.

That which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spir-rituall essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to ouerthrowe the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtelties of prophane Philoso-phie. One of the olde writers seemed to haue said very well, That God is all that we doe see, and all that we do not see. But by this meane he hath imagined the Godhead to be powred into all the partes of the world. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparsely of his owne essence, yet by those two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away all grosse imaginations, and also represseth the presumptuous boldnes of mans minde. For surely his immeasurable greatnesse ought to make vs a fraide, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: and his spirituall nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our mindes by reason of their dulnesse to lie still in the earth, for good cause he listeth vs vp about the worlde, to shake off our sloth and sluggishnesse. And here falleth to ground the error of the Manichees, which in appointing two original beginnings, haue made the duell in a manner equal with God. Surely, this was as much as to breake the vntie of God and restraime his vnmeasurable essence. For where they haue presumed to abuse certaine testimonies: that sheweth a foule ignorance, as their error it selfe sheweth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphites are also easily confuted, which haue imagined God to consist of a bodie, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth vnto him a mouth, eares, eyes, hands and feete. For what man, yea though he be slenderly witted, doth not vnderstand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such maner of speeches doe not so plainly expresse what God is, as they do apply the vnderstanding of him to our slender capacitie. Which to doe, it behooued of necessitie that he descended a great way beneath his owne height.

2 But he also setteth out himselfe by another speciall marke, whereby he may be more neerely knowne. For he so declareth himselfe to be but one, that he yet giueth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except we learne, a bare and emptie name of God without any true God lieth in our braine. And that no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is diuided in three persons, we must here seeke a short and easie definition to deliuer vs from all error. But because many do make much ado about this word Person, as a thing inuented by man: how iustly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostle naming the sonne the engraued forme of the Hypostasis of his father, he vndoubtedly meanneth, that the father hath some being, wherein he differeth from the sonne. For to take it for essence (as some expositors haue done, as if Christ like a peece of waxe printed

The scripture teacheth God to be an essence vnmeasurable & spirituall, doth not only stay men from measuring God by sense and from imagining any earthly thing of him, but also by the one doth conuince the Manichees, by the other the Anthropomorphites of madnesse.

The scriptures teach one diuine essence wherein there are three distinguished, but not diuided persons subsisting.

Heb. 1. 3.

with a seale did represent the substance of the father) were not onely hard but also an absurditie. For sith the essence of God is single or one and vndiuisible, he that in himselfe containeth it all, and not by peecemeale, or by deriuation, but in whole perfection, should very vproperly, yea, fondly be called the engraued forme of him. But because the father although he be in his owne proper tie distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholly in his sonne, it is for good cause said, that he hath giuen his Hypostasis, to be seene in him. Wherewith aptly agreeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightnes of his glorie: Surely by the Apostles words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the father, that shineth in the sonne: whereby also againe is easily perceiued the Hypostasis of the sonne that distinguisheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy Ghost. For we shall by and by prooue him to be God, and yet he must needs be other than the father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is vnlawful to make manifold. Therefore, if the Apostles testimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypostases. This terme seeing the Latines haue expressed with the name of Person, it were too much pride and vauwardnes to braule about so cleere a matter. But if we list word for word to translate, we may call it subsistence. Many in the same sense haue called it substance. And the name of Person hath not been in vse among the Latines onely, but also the Grecians, perhaps to declare a consent, haue taught that there are three Prosops, that is to say Persons in God. But they, whether they be Greekes or Latines that differ one from another in the word, doe very well agree in the summe of the matter.

*With the names of Trinitie and Person no man should

3 Now howsoeuer the herenkes barke at the name of person, or some ouermuch precise men doe carpe that they like not the word fained by deuise of men: sith they cannot get of vs to say, that there be three, whereof euery one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many Gods: what vnreasonablenesse is this, to mislike wordes, which expresse none other thing but that which is testified and approoued by the Scriptures? It were better (say they) to restrain not only our meanings but also our words within the bounds of Scripture, than to deuise strange names that may be the beginnings of disagreement and brawling: so doe we tier our selues with strife about words: so the truth is lost in contending: so charitie is broken by odiouly brawling together. If they call that a strange word, which cannot be shewed in Scripture, as it is written in number of syllables: then they binde vs to a hard law, whereby is condemned all exposition that is not peeced together, with bare laying together of textes of Scripture. But if they meane that to be strange, which being curiously deuised, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaptly, or to no profite vsed, which withdraweth from the simplicitie of the word of God, then with all my hart I embrace their sober minde. For I iudge that we ought with no lesse deuout reuerence to talke of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoeuer we doe of our selues thinke of him, is foolish, and whatsoeuer we speake is vnfauoric. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke and speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what withstandeth vs, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacitie doubtfull and entangled, we may in plainer words expresse them, being yet such words as doe reuerently and faithfully serue the trueth of the Scripture, and be vsed sparsely, modestly, and not without occasion? Of which sort there are examples ynough. And where as it shall by prooffe appeere that the Church of great necessitie was enforced to vse the names of Trinitie, and Persons, if any shall then finde fault with the newnesse of words, shall he not be iustly thought to be greued at the light of the truth, as he that blameth onely this, that the truth is made so plaine and cleere to discern?

*The crooked sub-
sistie of heresikes

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vse, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that do mock it out with cauiltions.

tions. Which thing we haue at this day too much in experience, who haue great busines in vanquishing the enimies of true and sound doctrine. With such folding and crooked winding these slipperie snakes do slide away, vnlesse they be strongly griped and holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meanings in exquisite plainnes, least they should leaue any crooked bywaies to the wicked, to whom the doubtful constructions of words were hiding holes of errors. Arrius confessed Christ to be God, and the sonne of God, because he could not gainsay the euident words of God, and as if he had beene so sufficiently discharged, did faine a certaine consent with the rest. But in the meane while he ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was creat, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtiltie out of his den, the ancient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternal son of the father & consubstantiall with the father. Heereat wickednes began to boile, when the Arrians began to hate and detest the name Omoiosion, consubstantiall. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now haue denied him to be consubstantiall with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as braulers and contentions, because for one little words sake, they were so hot in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little word shewed the difference betweene the true beleeuing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accounted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, and Holy Ghost, saying in disputation that they were not made to shew any maner of distinction, but only were scuerall additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, he confessed, that he beleued the father God, the sonne God, the holy Ghost God. But afterward he would readily slip away with saying, that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, iust God, and wise God: and so he sung another song, that the Father is the Son, and the holy Ghost is the Father, without any order, without any distinction. The good doctors which then had care of godlines, to subdue his wickednes, cried out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties: and to the end to sense the selues against the crooked with the subtilties with plaine & simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly subsist in one God, or (which came al to one effect) that there did subsist in the vnitie of God a Trinitie of persons.

5 If then the names haue not beene without cause inuented, we ought to take heed, that in reiecting them we be not iustly blamed of proude presumptuousnes. I would to God they were buried indeed, so that this faith were agreede of all men that the Father and the Sonne, and the holy Ghost be one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the holy Ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine propriety. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my hart to strue for bare words. For I note, that the olde fathers, which otherwise speake verie religiously of such matters, did not euerie where agree one with another, nor euery one with himselfe. For what formes of speech vsed by the Councils doth Hilary excuse? To how great libertie doeth Augustine sometime breake forth? How vnlike are the Greeces to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time: When the Latins ment to expresse the word Omoiosion, they called it Consubstantiall, declaring the substance of the Father & the Son to be one, so vsing the word substance for essence. Whereupon Hierome to Damasus sayeth, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substances in God: and yet about a hundred times you shall finde in Hilary, that there are three substances in God. In the word Hypostasis, how is Hierome accombred? For he suspecteth that there lurketh poyson in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man do vse this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that it is an improper speech, if he spake vnfaignedly, and did not rather wittingly & willingly seeke beletters to devise new words for plainer opening of that, vnder which their poyson lurked, as, Consubstantiall, against the Arrians: Personall Trinitie, against the Sabellians.

The words which haue beene in this case devised for opening of the truth, so that the things themselves be agreed upon, are neither cuer fitly to be vttered, nor too waywardly to be refused.

to charge the Bishops of the Eastlands, whom hee sought to charge with an vniust sclander. Sure this one thing he speaketh not verie truely, that in all prophane schooles, Onisa, essence is nothing else but hypostasis, which is prooued false by the common and accustomed vse. Augustine is more modest and gentle, which although he say, that the word hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latine eares, yet so far is it off, that he taketh from the Greeks their vsuall manner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Greeke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the sixt booke of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this ende, as though he ment that he had by vnskillful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hillarie himselfe laieth it for a great faulte to the heretikes charge, that by their waiwardnes he is compelled, to put those things in peril of the speech of men, which ought to haue bin kept in religiousnes of minds, plainly confessing that this is to do things vnlawfull, to speake that ought not to be spoken, to attempt things not licenced. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many words, for that he was so bolde to vter newe names. For after he had vsed the naturall names Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, hee addeth that whatsoever is sought further, is beyonde the compass of speech, beyonde the reach of sense, and beyonde the capacite of vnderstanding. And in another place he saith, that happie are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had nor receiued, nor knewe any other confission, but that olde and simple one, which from the time of the Apostles was receiued in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrung out of necessitie by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to expresse that which is, but that it should not be vnspoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost are three. This modestie of the holy men ought to waine vs, that wee doe not forthwith so seuerely, like Censors, note them with infamie that refuse to subscribe and swear to such wordes as wee propounde them: so that they doe it not of pride, of frowardnesse, or of malicious craft. Let them againe consider, by how great necessitie we are driuen to speake so, that by litle and litle they may be enured with that profitable manner of speech. Let them also learne to beware, lest sith we must meeete on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellianus, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to cauil, they bring themselves in suspition, that they be the disciples either of Arrius or of Sabellius. Arrius saith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was created, and had a beginning. He saith Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the eares of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithfull be, although by singular prerogatiue. Say once that Christ is Consubstantiall with his Father, then plucke you off his visour from the dissembler, and yet you adde nothing to the scripture. Sabellius saith, that the seuerall names, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, signifie nothing in God seuerally distinct: say that they are three: and he will crie out that you name three gods. Say that there is in one essence a Trinitie of persons, then shall you in one word both say what the Scripture speaketh, and stop their vaine babling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstition, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would neuer so faine, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must vnderstand an vnite of substance: when we heare of three in one essence, that it is ment of the persons of the trinitie. Which thing being without fraud confessed, we stay no longer vpon words. But I haue long ago founde, and that often, that whoeuer do obstinately quarell about words, do keepe within them a secret poison: so that it is better willingly to prouoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkly.

The essence of God is one simple and single thing, wherem there are

6 But leauing disputation of wordes, I will now begin to speake of the matter it selfe. I cal therefore a Person, a subsistence in the essence of God, which hauing relation to the other is distinguished from them with vncommunicable propertie. By the name name of the subsistence we meane another thing than the essence. For if the word had simply been God, and in the meane time had nothing severally proper to it selfe, Iohn had said amisse that it was with God. Where he forthwith addeth, that God himselfe was the same worde, he calleth vs backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not be with God, but that it must rest in the father: hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be ioyned to the essence with an vnseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall marke, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistences, I say, that ech hauing relation to other, is in proprietie distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no lesse to the Sonne and the Holy ghoist, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the severall proprietie of either doth discern him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper vnto euery of them is vncommunicable. For that which is given to the Father for a marke of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Sonne. And I mislike not the definition of Tertullian, to that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certain disposition or distributiō, which yet changeth nothing of the vnyty of the essence.

7 But before that I goe any further, it is good that I proue the Godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghoist. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from another. Surely when the word of God is spoken of in the Scripture: it were a verie great absurditie to imagine it onely a fading and vanishing voice, which sent into the aire, commeth out of God himselfe, of which sort were the oracles giuen to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the worde is ment to be the perpetuall wisdome abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no lesse did the old prophets speake with the spirite of Christ, than did the Apostles and all they that after them did distribute the heavenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must vnderstand that the Word was before all worldes begotten of the Father. And if the Spirite was of the word, whose instruments were the Prophets, we doe vndoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he setteth the word as the meane. For why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating of all his works said, Be this done: or that done: but that the vnsearchable glory of God may shiningly appeare in his images? The futtle-noted and babbling men do easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Word, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expositors are the Apostles, which teach that the worldes were made by the fame, and that he sustenteth them all with his mightie Word. For here wee see that the word is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Son, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiall Word to the Father. And to the wife and sober it is not darke that Salomon saith, where he bringeth in wisdome begotten of God before all worldes, and bearing rule in the creation of thinges, and in all the works of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, seruing but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: whereas indeed it was Gods pleasure at that time to shew foorth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secret. To which intent also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I do worke cūen to this day. For in saying: That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then that the meaning of Gods speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of thinges, and to they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth Iohn speake, when he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all thinges. For he both giueth to the Word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth vnto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainly sheweth how god in speaking was the creator of the world. Therefore as of reuelations three subsistences, each differing from the other, hauing some incommunicable proprietie. Iohn 1. 1.

The word whereof in Scripture is said that the spirite was of it, the world made and sustained by it, that it was begotten of God before the worldes, that it worketh with the father, that it is the cause of all thinges, is no sounding voice, but that essentiall word which is the sonne of God the true and very God himselfe. 1. proceeding from God doe well beare the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the highest place that substantiall Word, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subiect to no alteration, abideth alwaies onc and the selfesame with God, and is God himselfe.

8 Here many dogges doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openlie take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steale from him his eternitie. For they say, that the Word then began first to be, when GOD in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But very vndiscreetly doe they to imagine a certaine innouation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relation to his outward worke, began to be giuen vnto him after the beginning of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heauen and earth: so doth Godlinesse know or admit no name that should signifie any new thing in himselfe to haue chaunced vnto God. For if any should come to him from elie where than in himselfe, then this saying of Iames should faile, that every good giuing and euery perfect gift is from aboue, and cometh downe from the Father of lightes, with whom is no variableness, neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is lesse to be suffered, than to faigne a beginning of that Word, which both alwaies was God, and afterwarde was Creator of the World. But full suttly forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shew, that there was no word in him before. Which is a most trifling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had neuer any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God said, Let light be made, the power of the worde appeared and shewed it selfe: the same Worde was long before: but if a man aske how long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe said: Father, glorifie me with the glory which I had with thee before the World was. And this thing Iohn also left not vntouched, because he first sheweth that in the beginning the Word was with God, before that he cometh to the creation of the world. We say therefore againe, that the Word which was conceived of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaying with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.

9 Although I doe not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but doe defer it to that place where we shall specially treat of the redemption: yet because it ought to be certainly holden without controuersie among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place will be very fic to recite all those testimonies that proue Christ to be God. When it is said in the xlv. Psalme, thy throne O God is for euer and euer: the Iewes doe caull and say, that the name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and foueraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternal throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternal Lord. Again, this title is giuen to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shall be for a God to Pharao. Some read it in the Genitiue case which is very foolish. I graunt indeede that often times a thing is called Diuine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not so yeelde: In Esaie is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the foueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (saith he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the World to come, &c. Here the Iewes barke againe, and turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the world to come shall call him: so that they leaue this only to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose should so many names of addition in this place be heaped vpo God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorne

Christ

Christ with such speciall notes as may build our faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like sort called the strong God, as he is a litle before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer than that place of Hieremy where he saith, that this shall be the name whereby the seed of Dauid shall be called Iehouah our righteousness. For where the Jewes themselves do teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addition, and that this only name Iehouah which they call vnspeakable is a substantiue name to expresse his essence: we gather that the Son is the onely and eternall God, which saith in another place that he will not giue his glorie to another. But heere also they seeke to scape away because that Moses gaue that name to the Altar that hee builded: and Ezechiel gaue it to the newe cite Hierusalem. But who doeth not see that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the auancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but onely to testifie the presence of God? For thus saith the Prophet: The name of the cite from that day shall be Iehouah there. And Moses saith thus: Hee builded an Altar and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltation. But more busines ariseth by another place of Hieremie, where the same title is applied to Hierusalem in these words: this is the name whereby they shall call her Iehouah our righteousness. But this testimonie is so farre from making against the truth which wee defend, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Iehouah from whom floweth righteousness, nowe he pronounceth that the Church shall so verily feele the same, that she may gloriously vse the verie name it self. And so in the first place is set the fountaine and cause of righteousness, in the other the effect.

10 Now if this do not satisfie the Jewes, that Iehouah is so often presented in the person of an Angell, I see not with what caullations they can moeke it out. It is said, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell challengeth to himselfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and say, that this is spoken in respect of the person that he representeth: this knot is not thus loosed. For being a seruant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate bread, commaundeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then he proueth that himselfe indeed was the same Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not onely an Angell but God. And thence cometh that he saide we shall die because we haue seene God. And when his wife answereth, if Iehouah would haue slaine vs, hee would not haue receiued Sacrifice at our hands: in this she doth confess that hee was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the answer of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why dost thou aske me of my name, which is marvellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Seruetto, when he affirmed that God neuer appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truly and wisely haue the true teaching doctours of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the Word of God, which then as aforehande began to execute the office of mediator. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time he retained that which was his owne, to be the God of vnspeakable glorie. The same thing meaneth Oseas, which after he had receiued the wrastling of Jacob with the Angell, saith: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthis of memorie is his name. Here againe Seruetto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme that which Moses had said: why dost thou aske me of my name? And the confession of the Holy Patriarch doth sufficiently declare that hee was not a created Angell, but one in whom the full Godhead was resident, when hee saide: I haue seene God face to face. And for this cause Paul saith, that Christ was guide of the people in the wilderness. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be wayed without contention, the Angel that sent another Angell was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is foueraigne power ascribed. I omit innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they do not much moue the Iewes. For when it is said in Esaie: Behold, this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shal waite vpon him, & he shal saue vs, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is ment God which raiseth vp for the saluation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeated suffer it to be drawen no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie, where he promisseth that he shall come, the Lord that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only foueraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the same God that was euer honored among the Iewes.

II As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauell rather shortly to chooſe out twise, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediatour in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth shall aptly serue to prouue his Godhead. First, this is worthie to be singularly marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles do shew that they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esaie prophecieth that the Lord of hostes shall be to the Iewes and Israelites a stumbling stone & a rocke to fall vpon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declarth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in another place, We must all (saith hee) once be brought to appeare before the iudgment throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all roongs sweare. Seeing God in Esaie speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deed performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe same God, whose glorie may not be withdrawn to another. And that thing which writing to the Ephesiens he alleageth out of the Psalmes, is euiden that it can be applyed to none but to God alone. Ascending on hie he hath carried captiuitie captiue, meaning that such ascending was in shadow shewed, when God in notable victorie against foreine nations did shew forth his power, but he declarth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glorie of the Son that was reueiled to Esaie by a vision, whereas in deede the Prophet himselfe writeth that the maiesty of God appeared vnto him. And it is euiden that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrues applyeth to the Sonne, are the plaine tides of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst laie the foundations of heauen and earth, &c. Againe, worship him all yce his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Psalmes, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercie of Sion. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations and Ilands. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the maiestie of God to Christ, which in his perface had said that the worde was alway God? Why should Paul feare to set Christ in the iudgement throne of God, hauing before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he saied that hee was God blessed to the ende of worlds? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be praised to the end of worldes, then he is the same to whome in another place he affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainly cryeth out, that he would haue counted it no robbrie, if he had shewed himselfe equall with God, but that he willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, Iohn goeth further and saith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought abundantly to satisfie vs, that he is called God, specially of that witness which expressly affirmeth vnto vs, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witness is Paule, which saith thus: How many fouer be called Gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openlie shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne blood purchased the church vnto himselfe: why should we imagine a second God which he himselfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lord and his God, doth professe that he is that onely one God whom he had alwaies worshipped.

12 Now if we esteeme his Godhead by the workes that in the Scripture are ascribed vnto him, it shall thereby more euidently appeare. For when he said that from the beginning he was thitherto working with his Father: the Iewes which were most dull in vnderstanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceiued that he tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not onely breake the Sabbath, but also did call God his Father, making himselfe equal with God. How dull shall we be then, if we doe not perceiue that his Godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truly to order the world with prouidence and power, and to gouerne all things with the authority of his owne might, which the Apostle ascribeth vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteneth the gouernment of the world with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that do away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Iewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgie sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in wordes but also prooued by miracle that this power belonged vnto himselfe. We see therefore that he hath, not the ministracion, but the power of forgientlesse of sinnes, which the Lord saith he will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shall we say of searching, and pearcing the secret thoughts of harts? is it not the prerogative of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

His working with the Father, his gouerning of the world, his pardoning of sinnes, his perceiuing the verry thoughts of the harts, proueth him to be very God.

13 In his miracles how plainly and clearely doth he appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophets as the Apostles did equal and like miracles to these that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministracion disposed the giftes of God, he shewed forth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the end to giue glory vnto his Father. But we see for the most parte his owne power shewed vnto vs. And how could it otherwise be but that he was the very author of miracles that by his owne authoritie gaue power to other to deale miracles abroad? For the Euangelist declareth that he gaue power to the Apostles to raise vp the dead, to heale the leprous, to cast out deuils. &c. And they so vied the ministracion thereof, that they sufficiently shewed that this power came not from els where but from Christ. In the name of Iesus Christ (saith Peter) rise and walke. It is therefore no maruail if Christ alledged his miracles to confound the vnbeleeuingness of the Iewes: forasmuch as they were such as being done by his owne power did giue a most plaine testimonie of his Godhead. If else where then in God there is no saluation, no righteousnesse, no life: and Christ containeth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can object against me and say, that life and saluation is powred into him by God: for it is not sayde that he receiued saluation, but that he is saluation himselfe. And if none be good but onely God: how can he be onely man, being I will not say good and iust, but selfe goodnes and and iustice? Yea, from the first beginning of the creation as the Euangelist witnesseth, in him was life: and he euen then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being supported with such prooues we are bold to repose our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an vngodlinesse that robbeth God for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God? saith he. Beleeue then also in me. And so doth Paule expound those two places of Esay, Whosocuer trusteth in him, shall not be put to shame. Againe, Out of the roote of Isay shall he come that shall rise to rule peoples, in him the nations shall trust. And why should we seeke out more testimonies of Scripture for this matter, when we so often meete with this sentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternall life. Moreover the inuocation which hngeth vpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the maiestie of God, if he haue any thing at all proper to himselfe. For one Prophet sayeth: Whosocuer calleth vpon the name of Iehouah shall be saued: and another sayeth, a most strong toure is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous shall see and he shall be saued, but the name of Christ is called vpon for saluation: it followeth therefore that he is Iehouah. As for inuocation, we haue an example of it in Stephen, when he sayeth, Lord Iesu receiue my spirite. Againe, in the whole Church, as Ananias testifieth in the same booke. Lord (sayeth he) thou knowest how great euils this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly vnderstanded, that the whole fulnesse of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doth confesse that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs, whom he willett to glory in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare say, that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Beside that, the salutations set before the Epistles of Paule, with the same benefites from the Sonne which they doe from the Father: whereby we are taught not onely that those things which the Father giueth vs doe come vnto vs by his intercession, but also by communitie of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practise is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the godly minde doth behold God most present, and in manner handle him, where it feeleth it selfe to be quickened, lightned, saued, iustified and sanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the same fountaines we must fetch our meane of prouing to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghost. Very plaine is the testimony of Moses in the history of the creation, that the spirite of God was vpon the depthes, or vpon the vnfashioned heape: because he sheweth that not onely the beautie of the world that is now to be seene is preferred by the power of the Spirite, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirite was then busied in preseruing that confused lump of things. And that saying of Esay cannot be cauilled against, And now Iehouah and his Spirite hath sent me. For he communicateth with the Holy ghost his chiefe power in sending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the diuine maiestie of the Holy ghost. But our best prooue, as I haue said, shall be by familiar vse. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and such a thing as our selues doe learne by assured experience of godlinesse. For he it is that being eche where poued abroad, doth sustaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heauen and in earth. And by this point he is proued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his luely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the very worke of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any present quickening: what shall we iudge of him from whose power the same proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the sonne, so vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For he searcheth the deepe secrets of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsell. He giueth wisdom and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lorde pronounceth to Moses that it is onely his worke to doe it. So by him wee come to a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our iustification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing soeuer may be thought of, because it is the holy Ghost onely from whom proceedeth all kind of gifts. For that sentence of Paul is right woorthie to be noted. Although there be diuers gifts, and manifold and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirit: because he maketh him not onely the originall or beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these words. One and the same spirit distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he woulde not attribute vnto him choise of minde and will. Therefore most euidently doth Paul giue to the holic Ghost diuine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that we are the temple of God, because his spirit dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed ouer. For whereas God so often promiseth that he will choose vs for a temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirit dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustine very well saith: if we were commanded to make vnto the holic Ghost a temple of timber and stone because such worship is due to God onely, it were a cleere argument that he is God: now therefore how much cleerer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our selues to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the holic Ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to the holy Ghost, saide that he lied not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lorde of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the holic Ghost that speaketh. Yea, where commonly the Prophets saie, that the words which they vtter are the words of the Lord of hostes, Christ and the Apostles do referre them to the holic Ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Iehouah, that is, the chiefe authour of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that he was prouoked to wrath by the stubburnesse of his people, in steed of that Esay saith that his Holie Spirit was greeued. Last of all, if blasphemie against the holic Ghost be not forgiven in this worlde nor in the worlde to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his diuine maiestie is heere plainly proued, the offence or diminishment whercof is an vnardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the ancient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a marvellous meete place to alleage out of Dauid: with the word of the Lord the heauens were stablished, and all the power of them with the spirit of his mouth, to prouue that the world was no lesse the worke of the holic Ghost than of the Sonne. But forasmuch as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repeat one thing twise: and in Esay, the spirit of his mouth is as much to say as his word, that reason is verie weake. Therefore I thought good to touch a fewe such things as godly mindes might soundly rest vpon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the coming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly knowne. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this manner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby prouoeth that there is but one Faith.

Therefore

Epi. 4. 5.*

Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needs thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised: And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemne proffestation, Christ ment to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was alreadie deliuered, when he said: Baptise them in the name of the Father & of the Son and of the holie Ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the holie Ghost. Whereby is euident that in the essence of God abide three Persons in which the one God is known, And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diuersly to wander about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, and to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily proued, that if there bee diuers kinds of Faith, there must also be many gods. Now whereas Baptisme is a Sacrament of Faith: it proueth vnto vs the vnitie of God, because it is but one. And heereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, because we embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What ment Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holie Ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to beleue in the Father, Sonne, and the holie Ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certaine, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Worde and the Spirit are nothing else but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishlie did the Arrians prate, which confessing the godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would haue to be vnderstanded by the Spirit, onely the gifts of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisdom, vnderstanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God do proceede from him: so he onely is the spirite of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godlinesse. Yet is not he deuicd according to the distribution of his graces: but howsoeuer they be diuersely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith.

In sermone de

17 Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirit. In discussing whereof, howe great religiousnes and sobrietie we ought to vse, the greatnesse of the mystery it selfe doth admonish vs. And I verie well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I cannot thinke vpon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I cannot feuerally discern the three, but I am suddenly druen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may holde our thought withdrawn into feueralties, and doth not forthwith bring vs againe to that vnitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and holie Ghost, do prouoe a true distinction, that no man should thinke them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diuersly entituled: but yet it is a distinction, not a diuision. The places that we haue alreadie cited, doe shewe that the Sonne hath a proprie distinction from the Father, because the Worde had not bene with God, if he had not been another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glorie with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he saith, that there is another which beareth him witness. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Worde, which he could not, but being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreover, the Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not, nor rose againe, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh, but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to saie, that then the Sonne entred into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heauen to take manhoode vpon him? He was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glorie with the Father. As for the distinction of the Holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be another beside himselfe? as when he promisseth that he will sende another comforter, and often in other places.

18 But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I knowe not whether it be expedient. In deede the olde fathers are woont so to doe sometime: but withall they doe confesse, that whatsoeuer they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold, least if I bring foorth any thing vnsafely, it should giue occasion either to the malicious to caull, or to the vnskilfull to be deceiued. Yet such distinction as we haue marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giuen the beginning of working, the fountaine and spring of all things: to the Sonne wisdom, counsell, and the very disposition in the doing of things: to the holy Ghost is assigned power and effectually working. And although eternitie belong vnto the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy Ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue bene without his wisdom and power, and in eternitie is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this obseruation of order is not vaine or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckoned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the holie Ghost. For euery mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this; first to consider God, then the wisdom rising out of him, and last of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort the Sonne is said to be of the Father onely, and the holie Ghost both of the Father & the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viij. Chapter to the Romanes, where the same spirite is without difference sometime called the spirite of Christ, and sometime of him that raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testify that it was the spirite of Christ wherewith the Prophets did prophetic, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirite of God the Father.

19 Now this distinction is so far off from standing against the single vnitie of God, that thereby we may prooue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one spirite with him, and that the holy Spirite is not a thing diuers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypostasis is vnderstanded the whole substance, with this, that euery one hath his owne proprietie. The Father is whole in the Sonne, and the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth. I am in the Father, and the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiasticall writers doe not grant the one to be seuered from the other by any difference of essence. By these names that betoken distinction (saith Augustine) that is ment whereby they haue relation one to another, and not the very substance whereby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, & sometime that the Sonne hath both Godhead & essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this diuersitie Augustine doth in another place wel and plainly declare, when he saith: Christ hauing respect to himselfe, is called God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where hauing respect to the Son he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: and whereas to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: and where he is called as to himselfe the Father, and as to himselfe the Sonne: it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne: without hauing respect to the Father, we do wel & properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betweene him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinitie doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too subtly pearcing vnto the hie mysterie, to wander abroad by many vaine speculations.

That the Trinitie of persons is an argument to prooue the vnitie of God: and in what sense the father is the beginning of the sonne.

The diuersitie of persons, & the order of them standeth well ynough with one single diuine essence, whereunto we must haue recourse when the father, the sonne, or the spirit severally is called God, and not imagine each to be a severall God from other.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with sobernesse, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be knowen: that is, when we professe that we beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, we vnderstande the one onely and single essence in which we comprehend three Persons or Hypostases. And therefore so oft as we doe indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no lesse the Sonne and the holy Ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is ioyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction betwene the Persons. And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them; so as the beginning and originall is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the holy Ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly giuen to the Father. By this meane is retained the vniue of the essence, and regarde is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. And whereas we haue already seene that the Apostles doe affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whome Moses and the Prophets doe testifie to be Iehouah the Lord, we must of necessitie alway come to the vniue of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacrilege for vs to call the Sonne a feuerall God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himselfe cannot be saide to be this or that. Nowe, that the name of Iehouah the Lorde indefinitely taken is applied to Christ, appeereth by the wordes of Paul, where he saith: Therefore I haue thrise praised the Lord, because that after he had receiued the answer of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he saith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certaine that the name Lorde is there set for Iehouah, and therefore to reſtraine it to the person of the Mediatour were very ſond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And wee knowe that after the accustomed manner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly set the word Kyrios, Lord, in steed of Iehouah. And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sence pray to the Lorde, than in the same sence that Peter citeth the place of Isaell: Whosocuer calleth vpon the name of the Lorde shall be ſaued. But where this name is peculiarly giuen to the Sonne, we shall see that there is another reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is ynough to haue in minde, when Paul had absolutely praised to God, he by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Euen so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirite. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost be comprehended. Which is very plaine by the Scripture. For euen as there we heare God to be made a Spirite: so we doe heare the Holy Ghost, for so much as it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

With what ſobrietye we ought to diſpute againſt heretikes about the mysterie of the Trinitie.

21 But for as much as Sathan, to the ende to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the diuine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of Persons: And as in a manner in all ages he hath stirred vp wicked spirites to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he trauelleth out of the olde cinbers to kindle a newe fire: therefore here it is good to answer the peruerſe foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath bene our purpose, to lead as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to stiuie hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. Put now the truth which we haue already peaceably shewed, must be rescued from the caullations of the wicked: Albeit my chiefe trauell shall yet be applied to this end, that they which giue gentle and open cares to the word of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secret mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heede that neither our thought nor our tooong proceede any further than the boundes of Gods worde doe extende. For how may the minde of man by his capacitie define the immeasurable essence of God, which neuer yet could certainly determine howe great is the bodie of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eies? yea, how may she by her owne guiding attaine to discusse the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her owne substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarie saith, is a conuenient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knowen but by himselfe. We shall giue it ouer vnto him, if we shall both conceiue him to be such as he hath opened himselfe vnto vs, and shall not elsewhere search to know of him, than by his owne word. There are to this end written fine homilies of Chrysostome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrained by them from babbling vnbridledly. For they haue behaued themselues in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the unhappie successe of which vndiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selues to trauell in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and neuer haue in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same worde. The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is very harde to knowe, so doth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wits than is expedient. Let them remember that the mindes of men doe enter into a maze when they follow their owne curiositie, and so let them suffer themselues to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, howsoeuer they cannot attaine the height of the mysterie.

22 To make a register of the errors, wherewith the purenesse of Faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past beene assailed, were too long and full of vnprofitable tediousnesse. and the mozt part of heretikes haue so attempted to ouerwhelme the glorie of God with grosse dotting errors, that they haue thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vnskilfull. And from a few men haue sprung vp many sectes, whereof some doe teare in sunder the essence of God, some doe confounde the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if we holde fast that which is already sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that the essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, is single and vdiuided: Again, that the Father by a certaine propertie differeth from the Sonne, and the Sonne from the Holy Ghost: we shall stop vp the gate not onely against Arius and Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errors. But because in our time there be risen vp certaine phrentike men, as Sernetto and other like, which haue embraced all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discusse their falshoods. The name of the Trinitie was so hatefull, yea, so detestable to Sernetto, that he saide, that all the Trinitaries, as hee called them, were viterly godlesse. I omit the foolish wordes that he had deuised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and that this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeeth with the vnitie of God. In the meane time the Persons he would haue to be certaine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truly subsisting in the essence of God, but doe represent God vnto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing distinct, because once the Word and the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy ghost sprung also another god out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he saith, that the eternall Word of God was the spirit of Christ with God, and the bright shining of his

forme : Againe, that the holy Ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterwarde he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distribution, there is both in the Sonne & in the holy Spirit a part of God, even as the same spirit in vs, and also in wood and stones is substantially a portion of god. What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediatour, we shall heereafter see in place convenient. But this monstrous forged deuse, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation. For whereas Iohn pronounceth, that the Worde was God before the world was yet create, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, & from farthest Eternitie of time, that Worde which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the historie of the creation of the world, yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essentiall power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very vnfashioned lump was sustained in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternal Spirit was alwaies in God, when he preserued and sustained the confused matter of heauen and earth, vntill beautie and order were added vnto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or representation of God as Seruetto dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednes, in saying that God by his eternal purpose, appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this meane shew himselfe visible. For if that be true, there is no other godhead left vnto Christ, but so faire as he is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his Sonne. Morcouer, he so transformeth those imagined shapes, that he sticketh not to faine newe accidents in God. But this of all other is most abhominable, that he confusely mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the holy Ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which euery portion is God. And namely he saith, that the Spirits of the faithfull are coeternall & consubstantiall with God: albeit in another place he assigneth the substantiall deitie, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth another like monster. For certaine lewd men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednes of Seruetto, haue indeede confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner howe: that the Father which truly and properly is the one onely God, informing the Sonne and the holie Ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbear not this horrible manner of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, that he is the onely clientiator or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colour, that Christ is each where called the Sonne of God: whercof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometime given to the Father onely, because he is the fountaine and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpose, to make the single vnitie of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception and say: If he be truly the Sonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckoned the Sonne of a Person. I answer that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediatour) and yet for explications sake we ought to haue regarde of the Person, that the name of God be not taken simply but for the Father onely. For if wee meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throw downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so ofte as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison between the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly the God that appeared to Esaie was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Eſay testified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Jewes, was the onely God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the same was Christ. He that crieth out by Eſay, I live, and to me all knees shall bow, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose I erue the testimonies that the Apostle receiveth. Thou O God hast laide the foundations of heaven and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worship him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he saith, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this causation is nothing worth, that that is given to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightnesse of his glorie. For because in each of these places is set the name of Jehouah, it followeth, that it is so saide in respect that he is God of himselfe. For if he be Jehouah, it cannot be denied that he is the same God that in another place crieth out by Eſay: I, I am, and beside me there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremie: The gods that haue not made the heaven and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is vnder the heaven. Whereas on the other side we must needs confesse, that the Sonne of God is he, whose Godhead is oft proued in Eſay by the creation of the worlde. And how can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borrowe his being of another? For whoſoever saith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy Ghost saith the contrarie, naming him Jehouah. Now if we graunt that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoiled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title. The essence of God, if we beleue these trifiers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essence maker of the Sonne. And so shall the Godhead of the Sonne be an abstract from the essence of God, or a deriuation of a part out of the whole. Now must they needs graunt by their owne principle, that the Holy Ghost is the Spirite of the Father onely. For if he be a deriuation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirite of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimonie of Paul, where he maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreouer, if the person of the Father be wiped out of the Trinitie, wherein shall hee differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, but in this, that he only is God? They confesse Christ to be God, and yet they say, he differeth from the Father. Againe, there must be some marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true Godhead of Christ to nothing, which cannot be without essence, yea, and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnlesse he haue something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them answer if he haue not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meane they doe foule teare in sunder the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, & perfectly common to the Father and the Son. And if that be true, then as touching the essence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say, that the Father in giuing his essence, remaineth neuertheless the onely God, with whom the essence abideth: then Christ shall be a figuratiue God, and a God onely in thew and in name but not in deede: because nothing is more proper to God than to be: according to this saying: He that is hath sent me vnto you.

24 As in case by many places to prooue that it is fallie which they hold, that so oft as there is in Scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselves doe alledge, they fouly bewray their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne.

The arguments answered which are brought to prooue the Father to be the onely true God.

Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatively taken, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And their obiection where they say, If the Father were not onely the true God, hee should himselfe be his owne Father, is answered with one worde. It is not inconuenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisdom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For sith Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, he is called the Sonne of God, not only in respect that he was the eternall Worde before all worldes begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke vpon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to ioyn vs vnto God. And because they do so boldly exclude the Son from the honor of God, I woulde faine knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, least perhappes they shoulde take exception, and saye, that whatsoeuer goodnesse was in it, it came of free gifte. I aske whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they say nay, then we holde their vngodlinesse sufficiently conuincd: in saying yea, they conuincd themselues. But whereas at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of Good, that doth the more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common manner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, hee did admonish them, that the goodnesse wherein hee excelled, was the goodnes that God hath. I aske also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortall, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish, and false? Shall not hee then be immortall, that from the beginning, was life to giue immortalitie to Angels? Shall not he be wise, that is the eternall wisdom of God? Shall not the truth it selfe be true? I aske furthermore, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For hee claimeth this vnto himselfe, to haue all knees bow before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will haue that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against themselues, forasmuch as we see, that whatsoeuer pertaineth to God is giuen to Christ. And their cauillation hath no place, that Christ was exalted in the flesh, wherein he had been abased, and that in respect of the flesh, al authoritie is giuen him in heauen and in earth: because although the maiestie of king and Iudge extend to the whole Person of the Mediatour, yet if he had not bene God openly shewed in flesh, he could not haue bene advanced to such height, but that God should haue disagreed with himselfe. But this controuersie Paul doeth well take away, teaching that he was equall with God before he did abase himselfe vnder the shape of a seruant. Now howe could this equalitie haue stande together, vnlesse he had bene the same God whose name is Iah and Iehouah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is King of all the earth and Lord of the worldes? Now howsoeuer they babbie against it, it cannot be taken from Christ which Esai saith in another place: He, he, is our God, for him we haue waited, whereas in these words he describeth the coming of God the Redeemer, not only that should bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all points restore the Church. And with their other cauillation they nothing preuaile, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though we confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable inuention to say, that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either he should haue moe essences than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they grant that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfashioned. I know that many quicke nosed men do laugh at this that we gather the distinction of Persons out of the wordes of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers do see how vainly and fondly Moses should bring in this as a talke of diuers together, if there were not in God mo Persons than one. Now certaine is it, that they whom the Father spake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, yea the one onely God. Now therefore vnlesse they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authoritic of commaunding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: it shall followe that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speech to other foreine workmen. Finally one place shall easly answere two of their obiections. For whereas Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a spirit, this were not conuenient to bee restrained to the Father onely, as if the Word himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirit doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worship him in spirit and truth: whereupon followeth another thing, because Christ doth vnder a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth giue the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroy his owne Godhead, but by degrees to lift vs vp vnto it.

Gen. 1. 26.

Iohn. 4. 24.

25 But in this they are deceived, that they dreame of certaine vndiuided singular things, wherof each haue a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentiall God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy Ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his wisdome, therefore rightfully as is abovesaid, he is counted the originall and fountaine of al the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsly and caullously they ascribe vnto vs a deuite of their owne braine, as though we did faine that by deuination there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is euident by our writings, that we do not drawe the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betwene them. If the persons were seuered from the essence, then peraduenture their reason were like to be true. But by that meane it shoulde bee a Trinitie of Gods and not of persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinitie, as though wee did imagine that there descend three gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnes where they say, that then the Trinitie, should be without God. For though it meet not to make vp the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none other wise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the Godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in olde time haue spoken of the Trinitie, haue onely applied this name to the Persons, for so much as it were not onely an absurde error but also a grosse vngodlinesse, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will haue these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, it is plaine that they do destroy the essence of the Sonne and the holy Ghost, for else the parts ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in euerie distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing shoulde remaine in the Sonne

There is one indissoluble diuine essence, which is vnbegotten, absolutely of it selfe and without beginning.

but a shadow, and the Trinitie should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

ued denie, but by

John. 17. 3.

26 Whereas they obiekt, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Son: to that we haue already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father onely, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as the madde men do fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the eternall life, that men beleuee in thee the one true God, and Iesus Christ whom thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediatour, hee keepeth the degree that is meane betweene God and men: and yet is not his maiestie thereby diminished. For though he abased himselfe, yet he left notwithstanding the Father his glorie that was hidden before the worlde. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternal God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, vnder this name of God is comprehended the Godhead which is his also. So when he saide to the Apostles: It is profitable that I go vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: He giueth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of Godhead to bee as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because hauing obtained the heavenly glorie, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He setteth his father in the higher degree, in as much as the glorious perfection of brightnesse that appeareth in heauen, differeth from that measure of glorie that was seene in him being clothed with flesh. After like manner in another place Paul saith: that Christ shall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternall continuance from the Godhead of Christ. If he shall neuer cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that vnder the name of the Father, is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that lifting vs vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vs vp vnto himselfe, in as much as he is all one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawfull nor right so exclusively to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, Iohn doth for this cause affirme that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he resteth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of new Gods do meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they soorthwith exclude him from the Godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the Godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

27 Whereas they heap vp many places out of Irenaeus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to haue considered, that then the holy man had to do in disputation with those frantike men, that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in old time spake by Moses and the Prophets, but that he was I wot not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether muelleth in this point, to make it plaine that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to deuiſe any other, and therefore it is no maruell if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner now, whereas wee are to stande against another sort of errour, we may truly say that the God which in olde time appeared appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man object that it was the Father, our answer is in readinesse, that when we stricke to defend the Godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heede to this purpose of Irenaeus, all that contention shall cease. And also by the sixt Chapter of the third booke, this whole strife is ended, where the good man standeth all vpon this point, to proue that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God: is verily the one onely God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principall point whereupon stood all his disputation, as by the whole proceffe thereof doth appeare: and specially the 26. Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not very God in deed. Moreover in another place he saith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioyntly called God by the Prophets and Apostles. Afterward he defineth how Christ which is Lord of all, and King, and God, and iudge, receued power from him which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subiection, because he was humbled euen to the death of the crosse. And a litle after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gaue the Law by the hand of Moses, and appeared to the Fathers. Now if any man doe prate that with Irenaeus onely the Father is the God of Israel, I will turne againe vpon him that which the same writer plainly teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same: as also he applyeth vnto him the Prophecie of Habacuc: God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose serueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing. And in the twelfth Chapter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleued God, because Christ is the maker of heauen and earth and the onely God.

28. And with no more truth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though he be rough sometime and crabbed in his manner of speech, yet doth hee plainly teach the summe of that doctrine that we defend. That is to say, whereas he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in vnitie of substance, and yet that the same vnitie by mysterie of orderly distribution is disposed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in state, but in degree, not in substance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He saith that he defendeth the Sonne to be a second next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places he sayeth that the Sonne is visible. But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is inuisible in so much as he is the Word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his owne person, he proueth himselfe farr from that error which we confute. And though he doth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the next peece of his writing expounding himselfe, he sayeth, that he speaketh not exclusively in respect of the Sonne, because hee denieth that the Sonne is any other God beside the Father, and that therefore their sole gouernement is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his wordes. For he disputeth against Praxeas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many Gods nor the vnitie torne in sunder. And because by the imagination of Praxeas Christ could not be God, but hee must also be the Father, therefore he so much laboureth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Worde and the Spirite a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kinde of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but onely sheweth the disposition and order that belongeth onely to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangeth that: How many persons thinkest thou there are, O most froward Praxeas, but euen so many as there be names? And so a litle after that, they may beleue the Father and the Sonne ech in their names and Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently

and grossenes of our wit, that least the faithfull should fall away to the inuentions of the Gentiles, it was necessary to haue God more expressly painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the world, which is compted the most tollerable description that is found among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behooueth vs more familiarly to know him, least we alwaies wauer in doubtfullnesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to haue a history of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seeke for none other God but Him, whom Moses hath declared to be the maker and builder of the world. There is first set forth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the first originall of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is very necessary, not onely to confute those monstrous fables that sometime were spread in Ægypt and other partes of the world, but also, that the beginning of the world once being knowne, the eternitie of God may more clearly shine forth and rauish vs in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moued with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, sith he might haue made it many thousand ages before : whereas the whole continuance of the world that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to six thousand yeeres. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because if mans minde will trauaile to attaine thereunto, it shall faile an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himselfe to proue the modestie of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godly old man speake, which when a wanton fellow did in scorn demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answered, that he buylded Hell for curious fooles. Let this grane and seuerer warning repress the wantonnesse that tickleth many, yea, and driueth them to cull and hurtfull speculations. Finally, let vs remember that the same inuisible God whose wisdom, power and iustice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the historie of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his liuely image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age, or dulled with any disease, doe not discern any thing plainly, vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles : so, such is our weakenes, that vnlesse the Scripture direct vs in seeking of God, we doe foorthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that follow their owne wantonnesse, because they be now warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, how much it had been better for them reuerently to receiue the secret counsels of God, than to vomite out blasphemies, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightly doth Augustine complaine, that wrong is done to God when further cause of things is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in another place doth wisely warne vs, that it is no kisse cuill to moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For how broad foucer the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Now, if one should quarrell with God for that the emptines wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Into like madnes run they that busie themselves about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the world innumerable ages sooner. To satisfie their owne greedines of minde, they couet to passe without the compasse of the world, as though in so large a circuit of heauen, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their inestimable brightnes may overwhelm all our senses : as though in sixe thousand yeers, God hath not shewed examples, in continual consideration whereof, our minds may be exercised. Let vs therefore willingly abide enclosed within those boundes where-with it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes, that they should not stray abroad with libertie of wandring.

men might know the God which made it, and not enquire why he made it no sooner.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in

The deciding of the creation was fixe daies, the order of creating, & the maner which Moses used in speaking of God, do shew what we ought especially so learne by that historie.

in a moment but in fixe daies. For by this circumstance we are withdrawn from forged inuentions to the one onely God that deuided his worke into fixe daies, that it should not greewe vs to be occupied all the time of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soeuer wee turne them, are compelled to looke vpon the workes of God, yet see we how fickle our head is, and if any godly thoughts doe touch vs, how soone they passe away. Heere againe mans reason murmureth, as though such proceedings were disagreeing from the power of God, vntill such time as being made subiect to the obedience of faith, the learne to keepe that rest wherunto the hallowing of the seuen day calleth vs. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be considered the fatherly loue of God toward mankind, in this: that he did not creat Adam vntill he had stored the world with all plentie of good things, For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and emptie, if he had giuen him life before that there was any light, he should haue seemed not so well to prouide for his commoditie. But now where he first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the vse of man, and furnished the earth, the waters & the aire with liuing creatures, & brought forth abundance of fruits to suffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident houtholder, he shewed his maruellous bountie toward vs. If a man do more heedfully wey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witness and pnblisher of the one God the creator. I omit heere that which I haue already declared, that he speaketh not there only of the bare essence of God, but also setteth forth vnto vs his eternall Wisedome and Spirit, to the end we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be knowen by the image that he hath there expressed.

The creation of Angels is a thing necessarie to be knowne, both because they are the most noble part of Gods workes, and also for that there are sundrie errors concerning Angels, which cannot without such knowledge be refused.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because, though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenes of the common people, reciteth in his history of the creation no other works of God but such as are seene with our eyes, yet whereas afterwarde he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easly gather, that he was the creator of them in whose seruice they employ their travell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacite of the people, doth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrarie, but that we may plainly & exprefly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Bicause if we desire to know God by his workes, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that, this point of doctrine is verie necessarie for the confuting of manie enours. The excellencie of the nature of Angels hath so dafeled the mindes of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subiect to the authoritie of one God, & brought as it were in obedience. And hereupon were they fained to be Gods. There rose vp also onc Manicheus with his sect, which made themselues two originall beginnings of things, God, and the deuill, and to God he assigned the beginning of good things, and of things of euil nature he determined the dcuill to be the author. If our mindes should be entangled with this error, God should not keepe whole his glorie in the creation of the worlde. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which giue that vnto the diuell, do they not in a maner giue him the title of Godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authoritie be granted to the diuell, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay and withstand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees haue, that it is vnlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euil: that is nothing hurteth the true faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euil in the whole vniuersalitie of the world, because neither the Eowardnesse and malice both of man and the diuell, nor the sins that

by scripture

that proceede thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisefome and iustice. Therefore to answer these peruerse deuises: it beliooueth vs to lift vp our munes higher than our eyes can attaine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the *Nice*ne creed God is called the Creator of all things, things inuisible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godlinesse appointeth, least the readers with searching to vnderstand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being led away from the simplicitie of Faith. And surely, forasmuch as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alway for our profit, and such things are as finally auailable to edifie, he doth either leaue wholly vnspoken, or but lightly, and as it were ouerrunningly touch them: it shall be also our duety to be content not to know those things that doe not profit vs.

4 That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commandements, are also his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all question. To moue doubt of the time and order that they were created in, should it not rather be a busie waiwardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to search, what day the other more secret armies of heauen beside the starres and planets first began to be? But, because I will not be long, let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modestie and sobrietie, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor thinke, nor yet desire to know any other thing than that hath bene taught vs by the Word of God: and another point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest vpon the searching and studying of such things as certaine to edification, and not giue our selues to curiositie or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in sound godlinesse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holinesse: let vs rest vpon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, we must leaue those vanities that idle men haue taught without warrant of the worde of God, concerning the nature, degree, and multitude of Angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken holde of, and are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in dayly vic. But if it greue vs not to be the schollers of Christ, let it not greue vs to follow that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shall it so come to passe, that being contented with his schooling, we shall not onely forbear, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Democrite, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both fittly and wittily in his Hierarchie of Heauen: but if a man examine it more necerely, he shall finde that for the most part it is but meere babbling. But the dutifull purpose of a Diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to stablish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable. If one should read that booke, he would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heauen, and did tell of things not that he had learned by hearefay, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paule which was rauished aboue the third heauen, hath vttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawfull for man to speake the secrets that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that trifling wisefome, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs know concerning his Angels.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heauenly Spirites, whose ministration and seruice God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shew himselfe vnto men. And vponlike reason are deriued the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they doe like a Gard enuiron their Prince, and doe adorne and set foorth the honorable Superfluous speculations, and curious questions about Angels, are to be auoided.

shew of his maiestie, and like souldiers they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their captaine, & are euer so prepared & in readines to do his commandements, that so soon as he doth but beckn to them, they prepare themselves to work, or rather be at their worke already. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other Prophets do describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God fate him down in his throne of iudgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them maruellously shew forth and declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he exerciseth and vseth his authoritie in the world by them, therefore they are sometime called principalities, sometime powers, sometime Lominions. Finally, because in them as it were sitteth the glorie of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the holy Ghost often vseth those other former names to aduance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels. For it were not reason that those instruments should be let passe without honor, by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his maiestie. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministry, as in a looking glas, they partly represent vnto vs the godhead. Although indeed I mislike not this that the olde writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, where the scripture saith, that the Angel of God appeared vnto Abraham, Iacob, Moses, & other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of al the Angels in deed, this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no maruill. For if this honor be giuen to princes and gouernors, that in their office they stand in the steed of God that is soueraigne king and iudge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnes of the glorie of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributors and administratours of Gods bountie toward vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie: they take vpon them the defence of vs, they direct our waies, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vniuersal, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath giuen his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waies. They shall beare thee vp in their hands, least thou chance to hit thy feete against a stone. Againe, the Angell of the Lorde standeth rounde about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Whereby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angell of the Lorde doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her mistres. God promiseth to Abraham his seruant an Angell to be the guide of his journey. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim and Manasses prayeth, that the Angell of the Lorde by whom he himselfe had bene deliuered from all euill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defend the tentes of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskew Israel out of the hands of their enemies, he raised vp reuengers by the ministerie of Angels. So finally (to the end I need not to rehearle many mo) the Angels ministred to Christ and were readie assistant to him in all necessities. They brought tydings to the women of his resurrection, and to the disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the deuil and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vpon them, that are bent against vs. As wee read that the Angell of God deliuer Hierusalem from the siege, slawe in one night a hundred fower score and sine thousand in the campe of the king of Assyria.

7 But whether to euerie of the faithfull be a severall Angell assigned for their defence, defence, I dare not certainly affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angell of the Persians, and the Angell of the Grecians, he sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdomes and prouinces certaine Angells appointed as gouernours. And when Christ saith that the Angells of children do alway behold the face of the Father, hee seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angells to whom the preservation of them is giuen in charge. But I cannot tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euery one hath his Angell set ouer him. But this is to be holden for certaintie, that not one Angell onely hath care of euery one of vs, but that they all by one consent do watch for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angells together, that they more reioyce of one sinner conuerted to repentance, than of ninetie and nine iust that haue stand still in their righteousnes. And it is said of mo Angells than one, that they conueyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elizabeth shew to his seruant so many fierie chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that seemeth more plaine than the rest to prooue this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doores of the house where the brethren were assembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they saide it was his Angell. It shoulde seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to euery of the faithfull are assigned their Angells for gouernours. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may well bee, notwithstanding any thing that there appeereth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had giuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to euery one two Angells, as it were diuers ghosts, a good Angell and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiously to search for that which doth not much import vs to knowe. For if this doe not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heauen do watch for his safetie, I doe not see what he can be the better, if he vnderstand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine vnto one Angell the care that God hath to euery one of vs, do great wrong to themselues, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had bene vainly promised vs, wherewith being enuironed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angells, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, and with Iude, the Archangell. And Paul saith, it shall be an Archangell that shall with sound of trumpet cal men to the iudgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angells, or discern one from another by speciall markes, and appoint euery one his place and standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael, and Gabriel: and if you list to adde the thirde out of the historie of Tobie, may by their signification seeme to be giuen to the Angells, according to the capacite of our weaknes, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christs mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousands, the seruant of Elizabeth sawe many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, that do campe rounde about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that spirits haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacite of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs out Angells with wings, to the intent we shoulde not doubt that they will be cuer with incredible swiftnesse, readie to succour vs, so soone as need shal require, as if the lightning sent from heauen should flie vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. Whatsoeuer more than this may be sought of both these points, let vs beleue it to be of that sort of mysteries, wherof the full reuelation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiositie in searching and too much boldnes in speaking.

Against the opinion of the Sadduces, who denied that there are any such spirits as we call Angels.

for certaintie, that Angels are ministring spirits, whose seruice God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom hee both distributeth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other works in executiō. It was in the old time the opinion of the Sadduces, that by Angels is ment nothing else, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this error crieth out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is maruell that to grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before alleaged, where are recited thousands and Legions of Angels: where ioy is giuen vnto them: where it is said that they vphold the faithfull with their hands, and carrie their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby it is cleerely prooued, that they are indeed spirits of a nature that hath substance. For whereas Stephen and Paul do say, that the law was giuen by the hande of Angels, and Christ saith, that the elect after the resurrection shall be like vnto angels: that the day of iudgement is not knowne to the verie Angels: that he shal then come with his holie Angels: howsoeuer they be writthed, yet must they so be vnderstanded. Likewise, when Paul charged Timothie before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, hee meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subiect vnto them: that Christ took vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the blessed Spirits, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of that Epistle expoundeth himselfe, where he placeth in the kingdom of heauen the soules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we haue already alleaged, that the Angels of children doe alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our safetie, that they maruell at the manifold grace of God in the Church, that they are subiect to Christ, the head. To the same purpose serueth this, that they so oft appeered to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediator, is called an Angell. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages ago raised by Satan do now and then spring vp againe.

That which Angels do for vs, must not cause vs to do the honour vnto them, but we owe to God.

10 Now it resteth, that we seeke to meet with that superstition which is cōmonly wont to creepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers, & deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by & by mans reason falleth to this point, to think that therefore all honor ought to be giuen them. So cometh it to passe that those things which belong onely to God & Christ, are conueied away to Angels. By this meane we see that in certain ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many waies obscured, when angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with immeasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more ancient than this. For it appeereth that Paul himselfe had much to do with some which so aduanced angels, that they in maner would haue brought Christ vnder subiectiō. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the author of all the good things that they haue: to the end we should not forsake him & turne vnto them, which cannot sufficiently helpe themselues, but are faine to drawe out of the same fountaine that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in them a certain brightnes of the maiestie of God, there is nothing wherunto we are more easily enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, and to giue vnto them all things that are due onely to God. Which thing Iohn in the Reuelation confesseth to haue chanced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this answer, See thou do it not. For I am thy fellow seruant, Worship God.

Col. 1. 16.

11 But this danger we shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to provide for the safetie of the faithfull, and to communicate the giftes of his liberalitie among them. Surely he doth not this of necessitie, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an onely becke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to ease him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weaknes, so that we want nothing that may auale our mindes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth that he is our protector. But while we see our selues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weaknesse and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, vnlesse the Lord after the proportion of our capacitie doe make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meane he not onely promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whome he hath giuen in charge to trauell for our safetie, and that so long as we be compassed with the garrison and support of them, whatsoever danger betideth, we be without all reach of hurt. I graunt we doe amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, we still looke about from whence other helpe may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentlenesse to helpe this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefite. An example thereof we haue in the seruant of Elizeus, which when he sawe the hill besieged with the armie of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was stricken downe with feare, as if his maister and he were then vtterly destroyed. Then Elizeus praied God to open his seruants eies, and by and by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and fierie chariotes, that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his hart againe, and was able with a dreadlesse minde to looke downe vpon his enimies, with sight of whome he was before in a maner driuen out of his wit.

Our frailtie is the cause why God who might do all things for vs by himselfe, doth so many things by the ministerie of his Angels.

2^d King. 6. 17.

12 Wherefore whatsoever is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that ouercomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore provided vs of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be mo on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that we should be led away from God by Angels, which are ordained for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among vs? But they doe leade vs away in deede, if they do not straight leade vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eie vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his hands that mooue themselues to no worke but by his direction: if they doe not holde vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that we may hang wholly of him, leane all vpon him, be carried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Jacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our mindes, how Angels descende downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe goe vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lorde of hostes. Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter yee shall see the heauens open and the Angels descending to the sonne of man, John 1. 51. Therefore the seruant of Abraham being committed to the custodie of the Angell, doth not therefore call vpon the Angell to helpe him, but holpen with that commendation, he praieeth to the Lorde, and beseecheth him to shew his mercie to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them ministers of his power and goodnesse, to the intent to part his glorie with them:

That which God doth vs to releue our weaknes, must not cause vs to diminish his glorie.

them : so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministracion, that we shoulde diuide our confidence betweene him and them. Let vs therefore forsake that Platonical philosophie, to seeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose, that they may make God more gentle vnto vs, which superfluous and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day doe continue to bring into our religion.

Plato in Epynone & Craulo.

That which the Scripture hath concerning diuels, is to make vs watchfull, not to discourage vs.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning diuels, they tende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be careful to beware aforchance of their awaites and preparations, and furnish our selues with such weapons as are strong and sure enough to driue away euen the strongest enemies. For whereas Satan is called the God and prince of the world, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion : these descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more wary and watchfull, and readier to enter in battell with him. Which is also sometime let our in expresse wordes. For Peter after he had saide, that the diuell goeth about like a roaring Lion, seeking whome he may deuoure, by and by addeth this exhortation, that we strongly resist him by faith. And Paul after he had giuen warning that we wraffle not with flesh and blood, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darknesse, and spirituall wickednesses, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great and dangerous a battell. Wherefore let vs also apply al to this end, that being warned how they doth continually approach vpon vs an enimie, yea, an enimie that is in courage most hardie, in strength most mightie, in policies most suttile, in diligence and celeritie vnweariable, with all sortes of engins plentifully furnished, in skill of warre most readie, we suffer not our selues by sloth and cowardise to be surpris'd, but on the other side with bolde and hardie mindes set our foote to resist him (and because this warre is onely ended by death) encourage our selues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weaknesse and vnskillfulnesse, let vs call vpon the helpe of God and enterprife nothing but vpon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, strength, courage and armour.

The reason why sometime many diuels, and sometimes onely one is mentioned.

Mat. 12.42.
Luk. 8.30.

14 And that we should be the more stirred vp and enforced so to doe, the Scripture warneth vs, that there are not one or two or a fewe enimies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is said, that Mary Magdalene was deliuered from seuen diuels, wherewith she was possessed. And Christ saith, that it is the ordinarie custome, that if after a diuell be once cast out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth seuen spirites worse than himselfe, and returneth into his possession, finding it emptie. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that we must fight with an infinite multitude of enimies, least despising the fewnesse of them, we should be more slacke to enter in battell, or thinking that we haue some respice in the meane time granted, we should giue our selues to idleness. Whereas many times Satan or the diuell is named in the singular number, thereby is meant that power of wickednesse which standeth against the kingdome of Iustice. For as the Church and the fellowship of Saints haue Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, that hath the chiefe authoritie among them. After which manner this is spoken. Go ye, cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the diuell and his angels.

Mat. 25.41.

The malice of Satan being such as is to us, we must haue vnappeasable war with him.

15 Here also this ought to stire vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diuell, for that he is euery where called the enimie of God and of vs. For if we haue regarde of Gods glory, as it is meete we should, then ought we with all our force to bende our selues against him, that goeth about to extinguish it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdome of Christ as we ought, then must we needes haue an vnappeasable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne safetie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in waite for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the third Chapter of Genesis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that hee did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honour, and throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Euangelists, where he is called an enemie, & is said to scatter tares, to corrupt the seed of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherer, and a lyer, we finde by experience in all his doings. For he assaileth the truth of God with lies, obscureth the light with darknesse, entangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiseth vp hatreds, kindleth contentions and strifes, doth all things to this end to ouerthrow the kingdome of God, and drowne men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Whereby appeereth, that he is of nature frowarde, spitefull and malicious. For needes must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to assaile the glorie of God and saluation of men. And that doth Iohn speake of in his Epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine and principall workman of all malice and wickednes.

Matt. 13. 28.
Iohn 8. 44.

16 But forasmuch as the diuell was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which we asigne in his nature, is not by creation, but by deprauation. For whatsoeuer damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne reuolting & fall. Which the scripture therefore giueth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, we should ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him. For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lies, and addeth a cause why, for that he stood not still in the truth. Now when he saith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had been in the truth. And when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this from him, that he can not lay that fault to God whereof he himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose, to deliuer the maiestie of God from all slander. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning diuels? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things do nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not becoming for the holy Ghost to feed curiositie with vaine histories without any fruite: and we see that it was the Lordes purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we shoulde learne to edification. Therefore, least we our selues should tarie long vpon things superfluous, let vs be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of Diuels, that at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by twarding out of kinde, they both destroyed themselves and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to bee knowne, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude. God spared not (say they) his angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels, doth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

Satan being at the first created good, hath swarued out of his kinde by falling vpon himselfe from God.

17 As for the discord and strife that we say is between God and Satan, we must so take it that still we hold this for certaine, that he can do nothing but by the wil and sufferance of God. For we read in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receiue his commandements, and durst not go forward to do any enterprise till he had obtained licence. So when Achab to be deceiued heooke vpon him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the prophets, and so being sent of God hee performed it. For this reason is hee called the cuill spirit of the Lorde that tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the finnes of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, that the plagues were laid vpon upon the Egyptians by the euil angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testifie, that the blinding of the wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is euident therefore that Satan is vnder the power of God, and so gouerned by his authoritie that he is compelled to doe him seruice. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, that the works of Satan disagree with the works of God, we doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the sufferance of God. I speake not now of his will, nor of his endeour, but of the effect onely. For sith the diuell is wicked of nature, he is not inclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly caried to stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickednesse he is stirred vp to the enterprising of those things that he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tied and restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those things that are granted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to apply his seruice whither soeuer God compelleth him.

2. The. 2. 9.

Satan beareth not full sway ouer the faithfull, ouer the wicked he raigeth at pleasure.

18 Now because God boweth the vnclane Spirites hither and thither as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this gouernement, that they exercise the faithfull with battell, they set vpon them out of ambushes, they assaile them with inuasions, they presse them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them affraid, and sometime wound them, but neuer overcome nor oppresse them. But the wicked they subdue and drawe away, they raigne vpon their soules and bodies, and abuse them as bondslauers to all mischeuous doings. As for the faithfull because they are vnquited of such enemies, therefore they heare these exhortations. Do not giue place to the diuell. The diuell your enimie goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom he may deuoure, whom resist yee being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kinde of strife, when he saith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Sathans head, pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore I say, that the faithfull can neuer be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times stricken downe, but they are neuer so astonied withall, but that they recouer themselues. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised vp againe: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they so labour in all the course of their life that in the ende they obtaine the victorie: but I speake not this of euery doing of theirs. For we know that by the iust vengeance of God Dauid was for a time giuen ouer to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause Paul saith there is hope of pardon, although any haue been entangled with the snares of the diuell. Therefore in another place the same Paul saith, that the promise aboue alleaged is begun in this life, where in we must yrastle, and is performed after our wrastling ended: when he saith, the God of peace shal shortly beate downe Satan vnder your feete. This victorie hath alway fully bene in our head Christ, because the Prince of the worlde had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doth now partly appeere, and shall be pertited, when being vnclodeth of our flesh by which we are yet subiect to weakenesse, we shall be full of the power of the Holy Ghost. In this manner when the kingdome of Christ is raised vp and aduanced, Satan with his power falleth downe, as the Lord himselfe saith. I sawe Satan fall as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this answere he confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Againe, When the Prince possesseth his owne pallace, all things that hee possesseth are in peace, but when there cometh a stronger, he is throwen out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying ouercame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed vpon all his armies, that they shoulde not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would euery moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weaknes, and what is his furious strength) howe could we stande, yea neuer so little time against his manifold and continual assaults, but being supported by the victory of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuell to raigne ouer the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked and vnbeleuing to gouerne, whom God doth not vouchsafe to haue reckoned in his flocke. For it is said, that he possesseth this world without controuersie till he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that he doth blinde all them that beleue not the Gospell. Againe, that he performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and woorthely, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrath. Therefore, to whom shoulde they be rather subiect than to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally, they are saide to be of their Father the Diuell, be cause as the faithfull are heereby knowne to be the children of God, because they beare his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kind, are properly discerned to be his children.

19 As we haue before confuted that trifling Philosophie concerning the holie Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stretcht vp in the mindes of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly say, that diuels are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may we shortly do, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vpon this point. First, where the vncleane Spirites are called Angels, Apostataes, which haue swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the verie names doe sufficiently expresse, that they are not motions or affections of mindes, but rather in deede as they be called mindes or Spirites endued with sense and vnderstanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Diuell: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of the Diuell signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plainly, that the Diuell sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Iude bringeth in Michael the Archangel fighting with the diuell, doubtlesse he setteth against the good Angell an euill and rebellious Angell. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Iob, that Satan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the iudgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Some of Dauid, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Againe, Goe yee cursed into eternal fire that is prepared for the Diuell and his Angels. Againe, if he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into chaines of darknesse to be kept vnto damnation, &c. Howe soude shoulde these speeches bee, that the Diuels are ordeined to eternall iudgement, that fire is prepared for them, that they are nowe already tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleue the word of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new: I suppose I haue performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly mindes shoulde be furnished against such soude errors, where-with vnquiet men doe trouble both themselves and other: that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that error, while they thinke they haue none to stande against them, should waxe more slowe and vnprovided to resist.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearisome vnto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinarie workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere already saide, though this bee not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of things which God hath created

doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way focuer we turne our eies, all that we see are the works of God, and with godly consideration to wey for what ende God did make them. Therefore that we may conceiue by Faith so much as behouuerh vs to knowe of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the world, how it is shortly reheated by Moses, and afterwarde more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his worde and Spirite created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all liuing creatures, and things without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of things, to euery thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidings, and where all things are subiect to corruption, yet hath he so provided, that of all sortes some shall bee preferred to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secret meanes, and powreth now and then, as it were a newe luelinesse into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to increase by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not die together. So hath he maruellously garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plentie, varietie and beautie of all things as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stuafe, last of all how in framing man and adorning him with so goodly beautie, and with so many and so great giftes, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the worlde, let it suffice to haue once againe touched these few things by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller vnderstanding of this matter out of Moses, and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conueyed the historie of the world by writing to perpetuall memorie.

The first thing that we are to weigh attentively when we behold heauen and earth is, what vertues of God there are presented to be seene in creatures.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much adoe in disputing, to what end the consideration of the workes of God ought to tend, or to what marke it ought to be applied: for as much as in other places already a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe wordes be ended. Truly, if we were minded to set out as it is worthie, how inestimable wisedom, power, iustice, and goodnesse of God appeereth in the framing of the worlde, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largenesse of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite riches of his wisedom, iustice, bountie and power, we should not run ouer them, as it were with a flying eie, or with a vaine wandring looke, as I may so call it, but that we should with consideration rest long vpon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeate them with remembrance. But because we are now busied in that kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is meeete that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short, let the readers knowe that then they haue conceiued by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen and earth, if they first follow this vniuersall rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselves, that they may therewith be thoroughly moued in their hearts. The first of those we doe when we consider how excellent a workemans worke it was to place and aply set in so wel disposed order the multitude of the stars that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautifull to behold: to set and fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot moue, and to other some, to graunt a free course, but so that in moouing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may diuide in measure the daies and nightes, monethes, yeeres, and seasons of the yeere, and to bring this inequalitye of daies which we daily see to such a tempered order, that it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we marke his power in sustaining so great a bodie, in governing the so swift whirling about of the engine of heaven, and such like. For these few examples do sufficiently declare, what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should trauell as I said, to expresse it all in words, I should neuer make an end, forasmuch as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnes, so many examples of his wisdom, as there be formes of things in the world, yea, as there be things either great or small.

22 Now remaineth the other part which commeth neerer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard and safetie, and therefore withall do seele his power and grace in our selues, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby stir vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, praise and loue of him. Now, as I haue before said, God himselfe hath shewed in the verie order of creation, that for mans sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he denieth the making of the world into sixe daies, whereas it had bene as easie for him in one moment to haue in all points accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to the ende of it. But then it pleased him to shewe his prouidence and fatherly carefulnesse toward vs, that before he made man he prepared all that he foresawe should be profitable for him and fit for this preservation. How great vnthankfulnesse nowe should it be to doubt, whether this good Father do care for vs, whom we see to haue bene carefull for vs ere that we were borne? How wicked were it to tremble for distrust least his goodnes would at any time leaue vs destitute in necessitie, which we see was displeas'd for vs being not yet borne, with great abundance of all good things? Beside that we heare by Moses that by his liberalitie all that euer is in the world is made subiect to vs. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an emptie name of gift. Therefore we shall neuer lacke any thing, so far as it shall be available for our preservation. Finally to make an end, so oft as we name God the creator of heaven and earth let this come in our minds withall, that the disposition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand & power, & that we are his children whom he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring vp: that wee may looke for all good things at his hande, and assuredly, that hee will neuer suffer vs to lacke things needfull for our safetie, to the end our hope should hang vpon none other: that whatsoeuer we desire, our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing soeuer we receiue profit, we may acknowledge it to be his benefit, and confesse it with thanks giuing: that being allured with so great sweetnes of his godnes and liberalitie, we may studie to loue and honour him with all our heart.

The fruit of our considering the creatures of God must be the feeling of his goodnes toward our selues, and our growing thereby in faith, hope, & gratitude.

Gen 1:26, 7.

The xv. Chapter.

What a one man was created: wherein there is entreated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.

Nowe must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the workes of God the most noble and most excellent example of his iustice, wisdom and goodnes: but also because as we haue said in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, vnlesse we haue withall a mutual knowledge of our selues. Although the same knowledge be of two sorts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profit for vs to know our creation, vnlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformity of our nature:) yet at this time we wil be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heed that in precisely declaring only the natural euils of man, we seem not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh himself to haue sufficient defense in this colour; if it may lay for himself that whatsoeuer fault he hath, the same did after a certaine maner proceed from God, and sticketh not if he be accused, to quarrell with God, and to lay the fault vpon him whereof he is worthily accused. And they that would seeme to speake somewhat more reuerently of the maiestie of God, yet do willingly seeke to excuse their owne wickedness, by nature, not considering that therein though not openly they blame God also, & to whose reproch it should fall if it were prooued that there is any fault in nature. Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the waies to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her owne euils may any way be put off from her, we must diligently traueil to meete with this mischiefe. Therefore we must to li undle the calamitie of mankind that we cut off all excuse, and deliuer the iustice of God from all accusation. Afterwarde in place conuenient we shall see how farre men be now from that puresse that was giuen to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a biddle was put vpon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, than for them to glorie in their excellencie, that do not onely dwell in a cottage of claie, but also are themselves in part but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onelie vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vessell, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortall Spirit, Adam might iustly glorie in so great liberality of his maker.

Mans first excellence doth stop their mouths which blame God with mans evils, & his being made so excellent out of the earth, doth both humble him, & enameled his maier.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule and body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortall essence, and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometime it is called the Spirit. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirit are ioyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirit is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, saith that then the Spirit returneth to him that gaue it. And Christ commending his Spirit to his Father, and Stephen his Spirit to Christ doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is deliuered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit, because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or powred into bodies which yet hath no essence: both the thing it selfe, and all the Scripture sheweth, that they doe too grossly erre. True it is, that while men are fastned to the earth more than they ought to be, they waxe dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darknesse, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliue after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darknesse, but that they bee touched with some feeling of immortalitye. Surelie the conscience which discerning betweene good and euill, answereth the iudgement of God, is an vndoubted signe of an immortall Spirit. For howe coude a motion without essence attaine to come to the iudgement seate of God, and throwe it selfe into feare by finding hir owne guiltinesse? For the bodie is not moued with feare of a Spirituall paine, but that falleth onely vpon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the Soule hath an essence. Moreouer the verie knowledge of God doth prooue that the soules which ascende vpe about the worlde are immortall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attaine to the fountaine of life. Finally, forasmuch as so many excellent gifts wherewith mans minde is endued, doe cri out that there is some diuine thing engrauen in it, there are euen so many testimonies of an immortall essence. For that sense which is in brute beastes, goeth not out of the bodie, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenes of the minde of man which vieweth

the heauen and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in vnderstanding and memorie, diggesth euery thing in order, and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainly shew that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing seuerall from the body. We conceiue by vnderstanding the inuisible God and Angels, which the body cannot doe. We know things that be right, iust, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the spirit is the seate of this vnderstanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witness of immortalitie, forasmuch as it doth not only minister vnto vs, thoughts of those things that neuer were done, but also foreknowings of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers do excellently set out with more gorgeous garnishment of words: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe seuerall from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remove out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we doe put of that which is corruptible, finally at the last day we may receiue rewarde euery man as he hath behaued himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we doe ech where commonly light vpon, doe not onely manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giuing to the soule the name of man do shew that it is the principal part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithfull to cleanse themselues from all defiling of the flesh and the Spirit, he maketh two parts of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sinne. And Peter where he calleth Christ the shepheard and bishop of soules, should haue spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conveniently stand together which he saith of the eternall saluation of soules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he saith that euill desires doe fight against the soule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebreues saith, that the Pastors doe watch that they may yeeld account for our soules, vnlesse it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witness to his owne soule, because it could not be called in iudgement before God vnlesse it were subiect to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to feare him, which after that he hath killed the body, can throwe the soule into hell fier. Now where the author of the Epistle to the Hebreues doth distinguish the Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the onely Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirme from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly haue brought in the soule of Lazarus ioying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe, the soule of the rich man subiect to horrible torments. The same thing doth Paul confirme, when he teacheth that we wander abroad from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enjoy his presence being out of the flesh. But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will adde onely this out of Luke, that it is reckened among the errors of the Sadduces, that they did not beleue that there were any Spirites and Angels.

3 Also a strong prooffe hereof may be gathered of this, where it is said, that man is create like to the Image of God. For although the glorie of God doe appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no doubt that the proper seate of the Image of God is in the Soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape, in asmuch as the same doth distinguish and seuer vs from brute beastes, we do also therein more neerely approach to God then they: neither will I much stand against them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the Image of God, that where all other liuing creatures doe grouelingwise behold the ground, to man is giuen an vpriight face, and hee is commanded to looke vpon the heauen, and to aduaunce his countenance toward the starres: so that this remaine certaine, that the image of God which appeareth or shineth in these outward signes, is spirituall. For Osiander (whom his writings declare to haue beene in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the image of God without difference, as well to the bodie as to the soule, minglethe heauen and earth together. For he saith, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stand without falling, yet should Christ haue become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But where shall he finde that Christ is the image of the Spirit? I graunt indeede that in the person of the Mediator shineth the glory of the whole godhead. But how shall the eternall word be called the image of the Spirit whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it overthroweth the distinction betwene the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, if he doe here call him his image. Morcouer I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy Ghost in the flesh that he tooke vpon him, and by what markes and features he doth expresse the likenesse of him: And whereas this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe, which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osianders inuention be beleued, man was fashioned onely after the figure and paterne of Christ in that he was man, and so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, whereas the Scripture in a far other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their fittle inuention is more colourable which do thus expound it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the onely image of God. But that exposition also is not found. Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenes, while they seeke a difference betwene thoe two words, where is no difference at al, saying, that this word Liknes is added to expound the other. First we know that among the Hebrues such repetitions are common, wherein they expresse one thing twise: and in the thing it selfe there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Whereby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which doe so furtly argue about the words, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of the soule, or Demuth, that is to say, Likenes in the qualities, or what other thing soeuer it be that they teach. For whereas God determined to create man after his own image, this being somewhat darkely spoken, he doth as by way of explication repeat it in this saying, After his Likenes: as if he would haue said, that he would make man, in whom he would represent himselfe as in an image, because of the marks of likenes grauen in him. And therefore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doth repeat the image of God twise, leauing out the name of Likenes. And it is a trifling obiection that Osiander maketh, that not a part of man, or the soule onely with the gifts thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuen him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I say, will all readers that haue their sound wit iudge this obiection. For where whole man is called mortall, yet is not the soule thereby made subiect to mortalitie. Againe, where he is called a liuing creature endued with reason, it is not thereby ment, that the body hath reason and vnderstanding. Although therefore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconuenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I hold still that principle which I haue before stablished, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellencie, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kind of liuing creatures. Therefore in that worde is noted the integritie that man had when he was endued with right vnderstanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, and all his senses gouerned in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truly resemble the excellencie of his Creator. And though the principall seate of the image of God were in the minde and hart, or in the soule and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not so much as the body, wherein did not some sparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is that also in all the partes of the worlde, there doe shine some resemblance of the glory of God: whereby we may gather that where it is saide, that his Image is in man, there is in so saying a certaine secret comparison, that aduanceth man about all other creatures, and doth as it were seuer him from the common sort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the likenesse of God, sith (as Christ himselfe testifieth) our chiefe perfection shall be to become like vnto them. But not without cause doth Moses by that peculiar title set forth the grace of God toward vs, specially, where he compareth onely visible creatures with man.

Mat. 22. 30.

4 But yet it seemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, vnlesse it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: and whereby he ought to be counted a glasse, resembling the glory of God. But that can be by no other thing better knowne, than by the repairing of mans corrupted nature. First it is doubtlesse, that when Adam fell from his estate, he was by that departure estranged from God. Wherefore although we graunt that the Image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that all that remaineth, is but vgly deformitie. Therefore the beginning of recouery of safete for vs, is in that restoring which we obtaine by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored vs vnto true and perfect integritie. For although where Pauls doth in comparison set the quickening Spirit that Christ giueth to the Faithfull, against the liuing soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principall point, that this is the ende of our regeneration, that Christ should newe

The excellencie wherein man resembled God, consisteth in knowledge, and holines, not in the number of the faculties of his minde, nor in the power which God gaue him ouer other creatures.

fashion vs to the Image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renewed according to the Image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeeth this saying: put on the new man which is created according to God. Now it is to be seene what Paul doth principally comprehend vnder this renewing. First he speaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteousness and holines. Whereby we gather that the Image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the minde, in the vprightnes of the hart, and soundnes of all the parts. For although I graunt that this is a figuratiue phrase of speech to set the part for the whole: yet cannot this principle be ouerthrowen, that that thing which is the chiefe in the renewing of the Image of God, was also the principall in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in another place he teacheth, that we beholding the glorie of God with open face, are transformed into the same Image. Now doe we see how

Col. 3. 10.

Eph. 4. 24.

Christ is the most perfect Image of God, according to the which we being fashioned are so restored, that in true godlinesse, rightcounesse, purenesse, and vnderstanding, we beare the Image of God. Which principle being established, Oflanders imagination of the shape of our body doth easily vanish away of it selfe. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the Image and glory of God, and the woman is excluded from that degree of honor, it appeareth by the rest of the text, that the same is to be applied onely to ciuill order of policie. But that vnder the name of Image, wherof we

2. Cor. 3. 18.

speake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spirituall and eternall life, I thinke it be already sufficiently proued. And the same thing doth John confirme in other words: saying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall worde of God was the light of men. For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, wherby man excelleth all liuing creatures, to seuer him from the common sort, because he hath attained no common life, but ioyned with the light of vnderstanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the Image of God. Therefore sith the Image of God is the vncorrupted excellencie of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted and almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but disordered, mangled, and filthily spotted: yet the same doth in some part appeare in the cleet, in so much as they are regenerate, and shall obtaine her full brightnes in heauen. But that we may know on what parts it consisteth, it shall be good to entreat of the powers of the soule. For that speculative deuise of Augustine is not found, where he saith, that the soule is a glas of the Trinitie, because that there are in it vnderstanding, wil, & memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approoued, which set the image of God in the power of dominion giuen vnto him, as if he resembled God only in this marke, that he is appointed Lord and possessor of all things, whereas indeed the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

De cui. dei. 11.

Man was not made in the likeness of God because his soule was a portion of the god-head, or because the essentiall iustice of god was poured into him.
Gen. 2.7.

5 But before I go any further, it is needfull that I meet with the doting error of the Manichees, which Seruetto hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is said, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuay into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the unmeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie euen shortly to shewe how manie grosse and foule absurdities this diueltish error draweth with it. For if the soule be by deruation part of the essence of God, it shall follow that the nature of God is subiect, not onely to change and passions, but also to ignorance, euill lustes, weakness, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrarie motions do tossie and diuersly drowne his soule, oftentimes he is blind by ignorance, oft he yeeldeth as vanquished cuen to small tentations, and we know that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receiuer of all filthinesse, al which things we must ascribe to the nature of God, if we grant that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret in-flowing of Godhead. Who would not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truly indeed doth Paul alleage out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God, but in qualitie & not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly gifts. But in the meane tyme, to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that euery man doth possesse a part of it, is too much madnesse. Therefore wee must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created than the Angels were. And creation is not a powring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirit of man came from God, and in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be said, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also Oslander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly error, not acknowledging the image of God to be in man without his essentiall iustice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirit could not make vs like vnto himselfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially poure himselfe into vs. With whatsoeuer colour many do go about to disguise these deceipts, yet shall they neuer so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wits, but that they will easily see that these things fauour of the Manichees error. And where saint Paul entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like forme to God, not by in-flowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glorie of Christ, we are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spirit of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs not of one substance with God.

Act. 17.28.

Creation is a change of essence of nothinge.

2. Cor. 3.18.

The doctrine of Philosophers concerning the nature and powers of the soule.

6 It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortal substance. In deede some other also, that is the Socrations, do touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach that to other, which himselfe was not perswaded. But therefore is Pluto of the better iudgement, because hee doth in the soule consider the image of God. Some other do so binde the powers and vertues of the soule to this present life, that being out of the body they leaue to it nothing. Now we haue already taught by the Scripture, that it is a bodiles substance : now must we adde that although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, and doth there dwell as in a house, not onely to minister life to all the parts of the body, and to make the instruments thereof meete and fitly seruing for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to beare the chiefe office in gouerning the life of man, and that not onely about the duties in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the seruice of God. Although this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceived, yet euen in the vices themselves there remaine imprinted some leauings thereof For whence commeth it but of shame, that men haue so great care what be reported of them? And whence commeth shame, but of regard of honestie? Wherof the beginning and cause is, that they vnderstand that they are naturally borne to obserue Iustice, in which persuasion is enclosed the feede of religion. For as without all controuersie man was made to meditation of the heavenly life : so is it certaine, that the knowledge thereof was engrauen in his soule. And surely man should want the principall vse of his vnderstanding, if he should be ignorant of his owne felicitie, whereof the perfection is, that he be ioyned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire thereunto. And so the more that euery man studieth to approach vnto God, the more he thereby proneth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them that would haue diuers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, and a reasonable soule, although they seeme to say some, what by reason proueeable, yet because there is no stedfast certaintie in their reasons, we must reiect them, vnles we list to accomber our selues in things trifling and vnprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betwene the instrumentall motions & the part of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it selfe did not also dissent from it selfe, and some deuses of it do strue with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as that troublesome proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, that there are two soules, because the powers of the soule doe not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtle disputation of the powers themselves, I leaue that to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice vs for edification of godlines. I graunt that the things that they teach are true, and not onely pleasant but also profitable to be known, and well gathered of them, and I forbid not such as are desirous to learne to study them. First therefore I admit that there are six senses, which Plato better liked to call instruments, whereby al objectes are powred into Common sense, as into a place of receit: then followeth Phantasie, which iudgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belongeth the vniuersall iudgement of things: last, is the Vnderstanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse vpon, and consider. And to the Vnderstanding minde, Reason and Phansie, which are the three powers of the soule, that rest in knowledge, there doe answere three other that do rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the parts wherof are to couer those things that the Vnderstanding minde and Reason doe lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Phansie do minister vnto it. The power of Desiring, which taketh holde of these things that Phansie and Sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I feare that they shall more entangle vs with obscurenes, than further vs, I thinke it best to ouerpasse them. If any man list otherwise to diuide the powers of the soule, and to cal the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meane directed, and to call the other the power of Vnderstanding, which is by it selfe partaker of Reason, I am not much against it, neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Vnderstanding, and Appetite. But let vs rather choose a diuision,

de ratione et sensu*

Arist.
Ethicorum li. 1.

Item li. 6. ca. 2.

that is within the capacite of all men, which cannot be had of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speake most plainly, do diuide the soule into Appetite and Vnderstanding, but either of these they make of two sorts. Vnderstanding, they say, is sometime contemplatiue, which being contented with onely knowledge, hath no moouing of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Sometime they say it is practicall, which by conceiuing of good or euill doth diuersly moue the will. And appetite they do diuide into Will and Lust. Will they call that, when Appetite which they call horme obaieth to reason, and Lust they call that, when the appetite shaking off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, whereby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

Themist. de anima li. 3. ca. 49.
De duplici intel. de simib. lib. 3.

Two principall parts of the soule, vnderstanding, and will.

7 But we are constrained somewhat to swarue from this maner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, do wrongfully confound the two very diuers states of man. Let vs therefore thus thinke of it, that there are in the soule of man two parts, which shall serue at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Vnderstanding and Will. And let it be the office of Vnderstanding, to discern betweene obieets, or things set before it, as each of them shall seeme worthe to be liked or disliked; and the office of Will, to choose and follow that which vnderstanding saith to be good, & to refuse and flie that which vnderstanding shall disallow. Let vs not heere be staid at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotle, that the mind hath of it selfe no moouing, but that it is choise which moueth it, which choise he calleth the desiring vnderstanding. But to the end we be not intangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice vs, that the Vnderstanding is as it were the guide and gouernor of the soule, and that Will hath alwaies regard to the appointment of Vnderstanding, and abideth the iudgement thereof in her desires. According wherunto, Aristotle himselfe hath truly said, that fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the vnderstanding mind is affirming and denying. Now howe certaine the gouernment of Vnderstanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here we meane only to shew that there can be found no power in the soule but that may well be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this sort vnder Vnderstanding we comprehend Sense, which other do so distinguish, that they say Sense is inclined to pleasure, for which Vnderstanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the appetite offense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of vnderstanding is Will. Again, in steed of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly vsed.

Eth. lib. ca. 2.

The perfection of mans vnderstanding and will, in his first creation.

8 God therefore hath furnished the soule of man with an vnderstanding minde, whereby he might discern good from euill, and right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers haue called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adioyned Will, to which belongeth choise. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not only had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisdom, and iudgement, for the gouernment of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euen to God and to eternall felicitie. Then to haue choise added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, and order all the instrumentall motions, and that so the Will might be altogether agreeable to the gouernment of reason. In this integritie, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might haue attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to moue question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to discuss what might haue chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might haue stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not giuen him constancie to continue, therefore he so easily fell. Yet his choise choise of good and euill was free. And not that onely, but also in his vnderstanding minde, and in his will was most great vprightnesse, and all his instrumentall parts orderly framed to obedience, vntill by destroying himselfe he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, and for strong ioynts in an vnoyented ouerthrow. This principle they held, that man could not be a liuing creature, endued with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good and euill: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away between vertues and vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his owne aduise. Thus farre had they said well if there had bene no change in man, which change because they knew not of, it is no maruell though they confound heauen and earth together. But as for them which professing themselves to be the disciples of Christ, do yet seeke for free will in man, that hath bin lost & drowned in spirituall destruction, they in going meane betweene the Philosophers opinions and heauenly doctrine are plainly deceiued, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we haue to hold in minde, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posteritie euer since, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the parts of his soule were framed to right order, then stood safe the soundnesse of his vnderstanding minde, and his will free to chooise the good. If any do obiect that it stood but in slipprie state, because his power was but weak, I answer that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraine God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I grant such a nature had bene better, but therefore precisely to quarrell with God, as though it had bin his dutie to haue giuen that vnto man, is too much vniustice, forasmuch as it was in his own choise to giue how much pleased him. But why he did not vphold him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his own secret counsell: it is our part onely to be so farre wise as with sobrietie we may. Man receiued in deed to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. For of this will should haue followed stedfast continuance. Yet is he not excusable, which receiued so much that of his owne will he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compell God to giue him any other than a meane wil and a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glorie.

The xvj. Chapter.

That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his providence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.

BVt it were verie fond and bare to make God a creatour for a moment, which doth nothing since he hath once made an end of his worke. And in this point principally ought we to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the worlde, than in the first beginning of it. For though the minds of the verie wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth, are compelled to rise vp vnto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar manner by it selfe, whereby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serueth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleaged, that we doe not vnderstande but by faith, that the worlde was made by the worde of God. For vnlesse wee passe forward euen vnto his prouidence, wee doe not yet rightlie conceiue what this meaneth, that GOD is the Creator, howsoeuer wee doe seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with toong. When the sense

Men naturally by sense are brought to confesse God the Creator, we by faith acknowledge him to be the gouernour, not in generall of the world, but of euery particular thing in the world.

Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the verie creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doth nothing but wey and consider the wisdomedome, power, and goodnesse of the workeman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thrust themselues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine generall dooing in preferring and governing the same, vpon which dependeth the power of moouing. Finally it thinketh that the liuely force at the beginning put into all things by God, doth suffice to susteine them. But faith ought to pierce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernour and preseruer of them: and that not by stirring with an vniuersall motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the parts thereof, but by susteyning, cherishing and caring for, with singular prouidence euerie one of those things that he hath created euen to the least sparrow. So Dauid after he had first saide that the worlde was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the word of the Lorde (saith he) the heauens were stablished, and all the power thereof by the spirit of his mouth. By and by he addeth. The Lorde looked downe vpon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that he saith farther to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleueed, that God had care of mens matters, vnkisse hee were the maker of the worlde, nor any man doth earnestly beleue that God made the world, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doth by good order conuay vs from the one to the other. Generally in deed both the Philosophers do teach, and mens mindes doe conceiue that all parts of the worlde are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they attaine not so farre as Dauid both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth at the godly with him, saying all things waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them foode in due season. Thou gueest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hand and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou send forth thy spirit, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our being and are moued, and do liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is knowne.

Psal. 33. 6.

Psal. 104. 27.

Act. 17. 28.

We do iniury vnto God when we ascribe the workes of his prouidence vnto fortune, as also when we speake of nature working without the hand of God guiding her in euery worke.

2 That this difference may the better appeere, it is to be knowne, that the prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by aduencure. Nowe forasmuch as it hath bene commonly beleueed in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue bene beleueed concerning Prouidence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beastes, if by wind sodainly rising he suffer shipwracke on the sea, if hee be killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if another wandering in desert places finde remedy for his pouertie, if hauing bene tossed with the waues, he attaine to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduersitie the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the haire of his head are numbred, will seeke for a cause further off, and will firmly beleuee that all chaunces are gouerned by the secret countsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although euery one of them haue his owne proprietie naturallie put into it, yet doe they not put forth their power but onely so farre as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments,

whereby God continually powreth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that dooing. Of no creature is the power more marvellous or more glorious than of the sunne. For besides that it giueth light to the whole worlde with his brightnes, howe great a thing is this that he cherisheth and quickneth all liuing creatures with his heat? that he breatheth fruitfulnessse into the earth with his beames? that out of seedes warmed in the bosome of the ground, he draweth a budding greennessse, and susteining the same with new nourishments doth encrease and strengthen it, till it riseth vp in stalkes? That he feedeth it with continuall vapour till it groweth to a flower, and from a flower to fruite? That then also with baking it, he bringeth it to ripenes? That trees likewise & vines being warmed by him, do first bud & shoothe forth branches, and after send out a flower, and of a flower do engender fruite? But the Lord, because he would claime the whole glorie of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to be, and the earth to bee furnished with all kinds of hearebs and fruits before that he created the Sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the Sunne to be either a principall or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of the Sunne, but onely an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leaue it and do all things as easily himselfe. Then when we read that the sunne stood still two daies in one degree at the prayer of Iosua, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the Sunne doth not daile so rise and go downe by blinde instinct of nature, but that he to仁ue the remembrance of his fatherly fauour towards vs, doth gouerne the course thereof. Nothing is more naturall than spring tide to come immediately after winter, Sommer after spring, and haruest in course after Sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so great & so vnequall diuersitie, that it may easily appeere that euery yeere, moneth and day, is gouerned by a new and speciall prouidence of God.

Gen. 1. 3.

Ios. 10. 13.
2. King 20. 11.

3 And truly God doth claime and will haue vs giue vnto him an almightines, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleeping, but waking, effectually, working and busied in continuall doing. Nor such a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if he would command a riuer to flowe by his appointed chanel, but such a one as is bent and readie at all his particular mouings. For he is therefore called almightie, not because he can doe and yet sitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct onely continueth the order of nature that hee hath before appointed: but because he governing both heauen and earth by his prouidence so ordereth all things that nothing chaunceth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalm, that he doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine & determined will. For it were very fond to expound the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or dooer, because he is the beginning and cause of all mouing: whereas the faithfull ought rather in aduersitie to ease themselves with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandement of God, because they are vnder his hand. If then the gouernment of God do so extend to all his works, it is a very childish cauillation to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraud God of his glory than themselves of a most profitable doctrine, whoeuer do restrain the prouidence of God within so narrow boundes, as if he suffered all things to be caried with an vngouerned course, according to a perpetuall lawe of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if he should be left subiect to euerie motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth, & the waters. Beside that by that meane the singular goodnes of God towards euery man is too much vn honorably diminished. Dauid crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers breasts are eloquent enough to magnifie the glorie of God, because euen so soone as they be come out of the wombe, true,

They which do not acknowledge that God directeth the working of euery particular thing, doe not onely rob him of his honour, but themselves of a double benefite, hope of good things, and deliuerance from feare of euill.

true, so that yet our eyes and senses ouerpasse not that vnmarked which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers haue full and plentifull breastes, some other almost drie, as it pleaseth God to feede one more liberally, and another more scarcely. But they which giue the due praise to the almightinesse of God, doe receiue double profite thereby, the one that he hath sufficiently large abilitie to doe them good, in whose possession are both heauen and earth, and to whose becke all creatures doe attend vpon; to yeeld themselues to his obedience: the other that they may safely rest in his protection, to whose will are subiect all these hurtfull things that may any way be feared, by whose authoritie as with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his furies and all his preparation, vpon whose backe doth hang all that euer is against our safetie. And no other way but this can the immeasurable and superstitious feares be corrected or appeased, which we oftentimes conceiue by dangers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearefull I say we be, if where creatures do threaten vs or giue vs any cause of feare, we be so afraide thereof, as if they had of themselues any force or power to doe vs harme, or did vnforeseene or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against the hurtes that they doe, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeeth the children of God that they should not feare the starres and signes of the heauen, as the vnbeleuers are wont to doe. He condemneth not euery kinde of feare. But when the vnbeleuers to giue away the government of the world from God vnto Planets, doe faine that their felicitie or miserie doth hang on the decrees and foreshewings of the starres, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe, that their feare is withdrawn away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the starres and comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulnesse, let him keepe alwaies in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the secret counsell of God, so that nothiug can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it so to be.

That God doth not onely behold what is done, but order and dispose the doing of things both above & beneath.
Gen. 20. 8.

4 First therefore let the readers learne, that prouidence is called that, not wherewith God idly beholdeth from heauen what is done in the worlde, but wherewith as guiding the sterne he setteth and ordereth all things that come to passe. So doth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his eyes. For when Abraham saide vnto his sonne, God shall prouide, he meant not onely, that God did foreknowe the successe them to come, but that he did cast the care of a thing to him vnknown vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certaine ende. Whereby followeth, that prouidence consisteth in doing: for too much fondly doe many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether so grosse which giue vnto God a government but disordered, and without aduised choise, (as I haue before saide,) that is to say, such as whirleth and driueth about with a generall motion the frame of the worlde with all the partes thereof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of euerie creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithstanding this Prouidence which they call vniuersall) that all creatures may be moued by chaunce, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choise of his will. And so doe they part the government betweene God and man, that God by his power inspireth into man a motion whereby he may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefely they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themselues are gouerned by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicurians (which pestilence the world hath alwaies been filled with) which dreame of an idle and slothfull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the aire, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For against so euident madnesse, the dumme creatures themselues doe sufficiently crie out. For, now my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleued, which giuing to God a certaine blind, and I wot not what vncertaine motion, taketh from him the principal thing, that is, by his incomprehensible wisdom to direct and dispose all things to their end: and so in name onely and not in deed it maketh God ruler of the world, because it taketh from him the gouernment of it. For what (I beseech you) is it else to gouerne, but so to be ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maicst rule them by appointed order? Yet doe I not altogether reiect that which is spoken of the vniuersall prouidence: so that they will againe graunt me this, that the world is ruled by God, not onely because he maintaineth the order of nature which himselfe hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of euerie one of his works. True it is, that all sorts of things are moued by a secret instinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternal commandement of God, and that which God hath once determined doth of it selfe proceede forwarde. And heereunto may that be applied which Christ saith, that he and his Father were euen from the beginning alwaies working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him we liue, are moued and haue our being, and that which the Authour of the Epistle to the Hebrues, meaning to prooue the Godhead of Christ, saith, that by his mightie commandement all things are susteined. But they do wrong which by this colour do hide and darken the speciall prouidence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is maruell that any man could doubt of it. And surely they themselues that draw the same veile which I speake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they do wrongfully restraints the same only to peculiar doings. Wherefore we must prooue that God doth so giue heed to the gouernment of the successes of all things, and that they all do so proceede from his determinate counsell, that nothing happeneth by chaunce.

5 If we grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselues or by chaunce carried whither the inclination of nature driueth them, the mutual succeding by turnes of daies and nights, of Winter and Summer, shall be the worke of God, in so much as hee appointing to euerie one their duties, hath set them a certaine law, that is, if they should alway keepe one measure in equall proportion, as wel the daies that come after the nights, the moneths after moneths, & yeeres after yeeres. But when sometimes immoderate heates with drines do burne vp all the graine, sometime vnseasonable raines doe marre the corne, when sudden harme cometh by haile & tempests: that shal not be the worke of God, vntlesse perhaps it be because the cloudes or faire weather, or cold or heat haue their beginning of the meeting of the planets or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly fauour, nor for the iudgements of God. If they say that God is beneficiall enough to mankind because he powreth into the heauen and earth an ordinarie power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an inuention, as though the fruitfulnessse of one yeere were not the singular blessing of God, and dearth and famine were not his curse & vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritie of God himselfe suffice vs. In the lawe and in the Prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with dew and rain, he declareth his fauour; and that when by his commandement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blasting and other harmes, when the fieldes are stricken with haile and tempests, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we grant these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commandement of God. Dauid praiseth the generall prouidence of God, that hee giueth meate to the Rauens birdes that call vpon him: but when God himselfe threateneth famine to liuing creatures,

The particular appointment of God appeereth in the diuers alterations of things naturall, & extendeth to euery drop of raine, to euerie accident which befalleth the least bird.

doth

doth he not sufficiently declare that he feedeth all liuing things somtime with scarce, and sometime with more plentiful portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I saide before, to restraime this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparowe of neuer so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birdes be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confesse with the Prophet, that hee so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke vpon all things that chaunce in heauen and earth.

Hier. 10. 23.
Pro. 20. 24.

6 But bicause we know that the worlde was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therefore consider this end in the gouernance of man. The Prophet Hieremie crieth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steps. And Salomon saith, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lorde, and how shall a man dispose his owne way? Now let them say that man is moued by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that moouing whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truly said, then should man haue the free choise of his owne waies. Peraduenture they will denie that, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certaine that the Prophet and Salomon do giue vnto God, not onely power but also choise and appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Salomon in another place doth finely rebuke this rashnes of men, that appoint vnto themselves another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparations (saith he) of the hart are in man, but the answer of the tooing is of the Lord. It is a fond madnesse that men will take vpon them to do things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what he will. And the scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at all is done in the world but by his appointment, sheweth that those things which seem most happening by chance are subiect to him. For what can you more ascribe to chance, then when a broken bough falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lord saith far other wise, which confesseth that he hath deliuered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doth not leaue the happening of los to the blindness of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimeth the iudgement of them to himselfe: for he saith that it cometh not to passe by a mans owne power that stones are cast into the lap and drawn out againe, but that thing which onely might be saide to come of chaunce he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon, The poore man and the vsurer meet together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men and rich be mingled together in the world, while euery one hath his state assigned him from God, he admoniseth that God which giueth light to all men is not blind, and so he exhorteth the poore to patience, because whoso euer are not contented with their own state, they seek to shake off the burthen that God hath laid vpon them. So another Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lye in miserie & some arise vp to honor. To come to preferment is neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South, for God is the iudge, he maketh low and he maketh high. Bicause God cannot put off the office of a Iudge, therupon the Prophet proueth that by his secret purpose, some are in honor, and other some remaine in contempt.

The common

ciall prouidence

7 And also I say that the verie particular successes are generally witnesses of Gods singular prouidence. God raised in the desert a south wind to bring the people plentie of fowles: when his pleasure was to haue Jonas throwen into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tempest. But they that thinke that God gouerneth not the world, will say that this chaunced beside common vse: But thereby I do gather that neuer any winde doth rise or increase but by the speciall commandement of God. For other wise it should not be true, that he maketh the windes his messengers, and ferie flames his ministers, that he maketh the cloudes his chariots, and rideth vpon the wings of the winde, vnlesse he did by his will driue about the cloudes and windes, and shew in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place we are taught that so oft as the sea swelleth with blast of windes, those violences doe testifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth vp the stormie windes and it listeth vp the waues therof, and then he turneth the storme to calme, so that the waues therof are still. As in another place he saith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendering is naturally giuen to men, yet God willtch it to be imputed to his speciall grace, that he leauech some in barrennesse, and vouchsafeth to grant issue to other some, the fruit of the wombe is his gift. Therefore said Jacob to his wife, am I as God that I can giue thee children? But to make an end: there is nothing more ordinary in nature thã that we be fed with bread. But the Holy Ghost pronounceth, that not onely the growing of the fruites of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men liue not by onely bread, because it is not the very full feeding that nourisheth, but the secret blessing of God: as on the other side he threateneth, that he will breake the stay of bread. Neither could we earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnlesse God did giue vs foode with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to perswade the faithful, that God in feeding them doth fulfill the office of a good father of household, doth put them in minde, that he giueth meate to all flesh. Finally when we haue on the one side: The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his cares bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eie of the Lord is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: Let vs knowe that all creatures both aboue and beneath are readie to obedience, that he may apply them to what vse fouer he will, whereupon is gathered, that not onely his generall prouidence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his manuellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper end.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, doe caull that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Destinie, which also was once laide for reproch to Augustine. As for vs, although we be loth to it iue about wordes, yet we allow not this word Fatum, both because it is one of those whose prophane noueltie Saint Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men doe goe about with the odiousnesse therof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laide to our charge. For we doe not as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is contained in nature: but we make God the iudge and gouernour of all things, which according to his wisdom hath cuen from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he would doe, and now by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Whereupon we affirme that not onely the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and wils of men are so gouerned by his Providence, that they be directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then? will one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I answer that Basilius Magnus hath truly saide that fortune and chaunce are heathen mens wordes, with the signification whereof the mindes of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if euery good successe be the blessing of God, and euery calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for fortune or chaunce. We ought also to be moued with this saying of Augustine. In his booke against the Academites he saith: It doth displease me that I haue so oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant thereby, but onely a chanceable happening in outward things either good or euill. Of which worde Fortune are deriued those wordes which no religion forbidtch vs to vse, forte, sorte, forsas, forstan, fortasse, fortuito, that is, perhap, peraduenture, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet must all be applied to the prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue vnspoken when

1. cor. lib. 1. ca. 2.

I said, for perchance euen the same that is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in things nothing else, but that whereof the reason and cause is vnknown. I saide this in deede, but it repenteth me that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men haue a vry euill custome, that where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased Fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in his bookes teach, that the world should be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, and partly by the prouidence of God, yet doth he a litle after sufficiently shew that men are subiect vnto and ruled by prouidence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against conuenience of reason, than to say, that anything chaunceth but by the ordinance of God, for else it should happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hangeth vpon the will of men: and by and by after he plainlier saith that we ought not to seeke a cause of the will of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be vnderstanded, shall very well appeere by one place where he proueth that the will of God is the soueraigne and first cause of all things, because nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely he saith not God to sit still idle in a watch tower, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he vseth an actual will (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

Tri. lib. 3. cap. 4.

A thing may be termed chanceable, and be said to happen by fortune in respect of vs whose not the cause, when in respect of God who hath appointed it, it is necessary, and though not in it owne nature, yet by reason of his appointment incurtable.

9 But for as much as the dulnesse of our vnderstanding cannot by a great way attaine to the height of Gods prouidence, we must vse a distinction to helpe to lift it vp. I say therefore, howsoeuer all things are ordeined by the purpose and certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chanceable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world and men, and vnadvisedly toseth all things vp and downe (for such beastlinesse ought to be far from a Christian hart) but because the order, meane, end, and necessitie of those things that happen, doth for the most part lie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chanceable, which yet it is certain to come to passe by the will of God. For they seeme no otherwise, whether we consider them in their own nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge and iudgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, that a marchant being entred into a wood in companie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his fellowes, and in his wandering chaunceth vpon a den of robbers, lighteth among theeues, and is killed, his death was not onely foreseen with Gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre each mans life should extend, but that he hath set and appointed markes which cannot be passed. And yet so farre as the capacite of our minde conceiueth, all things herein seeme happening by chance. What shall a Christian here thinke? euen this, whatsoeuer happened in such a death, he will thinke it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in deed, but yet he will not doubt that the prouidence of God did gouerne to direct fortune to her end. In like maner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are vncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspence, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth settled in our harts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath alreadie foreseene. In this meaning is the name of chance oft repeated in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men doe not attaine to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret prouidence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the harts of men, but that euen in the darknesse there alway shined some sparks thereof. So the soothsaiers of the Pblishians, although they wauer in doubtfulnesse, yet they ascribe aduersitie partly to God, partly to fortune. If (say they) the ake goe that way, we shall knowe that it is God that hath stricken vs: but if it goe the other way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deed they did foolishly, when their cunning of soothsaying deceived them, to flee to fortune, but in the meane while we see them constrained, so that they dare not think that the euill hap which chanced vnto them did come offortune. But how God with the badge of his prouidence turneth all successles whither pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold euen at one moment of time, when David was found out and necre taken in the desert of Mabon, euen then the Philistines invaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to prouide for the safetie of his seruant did cast this let in Sauls way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sudden, and beside the expectation of men, yet may we not say that it came by chaunce. But those things that seeme to vs to happen by chance, faith will acknowledge to haue bene a secret moouing of God. I graunt there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but vndoubtedly we ought to beleue, that whatsoever changes of things are seene in the world, they come by the secret stirring of the hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely nor by the nature of it selfe. As there of is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a body like vnto ours, no wiseman will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible that they should be broken: whereby we see againe that not without cause were in schooles inuented the distinctions of necessitie in respect, and necessitie absolute, of conseqent and consequence, whereas God had subiect to bridlethence the bones of his son, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessitie by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue bene.

The xvij. Chapter.

Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applyed, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

NOW forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious fittleties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encombe themselves with entangled doubts, whofoeuer do not knowe the true and right vse of this doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly, to what ende the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the prouidence of God ought to be considered as well for the tyme to come as for the tyme past: secundarily, that the same is in such sort the gouernour of all things, that sometime it worketh by means, sometime without means, and sometime against all means. Last of all, that it tendeth to this end, that god may shew that he hath care of all mankind, but especially that he doth watch in ruling of his Church, which he vouchsafeth more nely to looke vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly fauour and bountifullnes of God, or oftentimes the feueritie of his iudgement do brightly appeare in the whole course of his prouidence: yet sometime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our mindes, that mens matters are turned & whirled about with the blind way of fortune, or so that the flesh stirreth vs to murmur, as if God did make himselfe pastime, tosse them like tennis balls. True it is, that if we were with quiet and still mindes ready to learne, the very successfullnes would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their euill affections and tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselves, or to awke their drowsinesse: on the other side to ouerthrowe the proude, to disappoynt the fittletie of the wicked, to confound their deuises. But howeuer the causes be secret and vnknown to vs: we must assuredly holde that they are laid vp

Four things in considering the prouidence of God do make the consideration thereof sweet and comfortable, that it serueth for things to come, as well as past: that it worketh by means, and without means: that it respecteth principally the church of God: & to the markett euen when the course of his actions seeme to perswade the contrary

in hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to crie out with David, God, thou hast made thy wonderfull works so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward vs. I would declare and speake of them, but they are more than I am able to expresse. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to thinke vpon our sins, that the verie punishment may moue vs to repentance, yet do we see how Christ giueth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish euerie one according to his deserting. For of him that was borne blinde he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glorie of God may be shewed in him. For here naturall sense murmureth when calamitie commeth euen before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserued it. But Christ doth testifie that in this looking glasse the glorie of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eyes to behold it. But we must keepe modestie, that we draw not God to yeelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret iudgements, that his will be vnto vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thick clouds do couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heauilome mysticenesse is cast before our eyes, and the thunder troubleth our eares, and all our senses are amused with terrour, we thinke that all things are confounded and troubled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietnesse and calmnesse that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of things in the world taketh from vs ability to iudge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doeth in well framed order gouerne and dispose euen those verie troubleosome motions themselves to a right end. And surely verie monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the workes of God to account and examine his secret meanings, and to giue vnaudenced sentence of things vnknown, than they will do of the dedes of most all men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modestie towards our egals, that we had rather suspend our iudgment than to incur the blame of rashnes, and on the other side proudly to triumph vpon the darke iudgements of God, which it became vs to regard with reuerence?

As we are to yeeld obedience to the known reuealed will of his law, so reuerence is due to the secret will, according whereunto he ruleth by providence.

2 Therefore no man shall wel and profitably wy the providence of God, but he that considering that he hath to do with his creator & the maker of the world, doth with such humilitie as he ought submit himselfe to fear & reuerence. Hereby it cometh to passe, that so many dogs at this day do with venimed bitings, or at least barking, assaile this doctrine, because they will haue no more to be lawfull for God, than their owne reason informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefulness that they are able, for that not contented with the commandments of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsils. As though the things that we teach were an invention of our own braine, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghst doth euery where expressly say the same, and repeateth it with innumerable formes of speech. But because some shame restraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen: they saue that they content with vs, to the end they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what soeuer happeneth in the world, is gouerned by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere, to what end the Scripture saith, that his iudgements are a deepe bottomlesse depth. For, whereas Moses crieth out that the will of God is not to be sought a farr off in the clouds, or in the depths, because it is familiarly set forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse depth. Of the which Psal also saith: O depth of the riches and of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his iudgements, and his waies past finding out? for who hath knowen the mind of the Lord, or who hath bene his counsellour? And it is in deed true, that in the Gospell and in the law are contained mysteries which

Psal. 36. 7.

Rom. 11. 33.

are

are far about the capacitie of our sense : but for asmuch as God for the comprehending of these misteries which he hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth lighten the mindes of them that be his, with the spirite of vnderstanding : now is therein no bottomlesse depth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candle to guide our secte, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainly discernable truth. But his maruelous order of governing the world, is worthily called a bottomlesse depth : because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reuerently to worship it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in few words. The secret things (saith he) belong to the Lorde our God : but the things reueiled belong to vs and to our children for euer. We see how he biddeth vs not onely to study in meditation of the law, but also reuerently to looke vp vnto the secret prouidence of God. And in the booke of Iob is rehearsed one title of this depth, that it humbleth our mindes. For after that the author of that booke in suiciuing vp and down the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the workes of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his waies, but how little a portion heare we of him ? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisdom that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisdom that he hath appoynted for men. For after he hath preached of the secrets of nature, he saith that wisdom is knowen to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all liuing creatures. But by and by after, he saith further, that it is published to the ende it should be searched out, because it is said vnto man : behold, the feare of God is wisdom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine : Because we know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in onely good will we doe according to the law, because his prouidence is an vchangeable law. Therefore, saith God doth claime vnto himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs vnknowne, let this be to vs a law of sobernesse and modestie, quietly to obey his soueraigne authority, that his will may be to vs the only rule of iustice, and the most iust cause of all things. I meane not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters doe babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his iustice from his power, but I meane that prouidence, which is the gouernesse of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right : although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

Deut. 29. 29.

Iob. 26. 14.

Iob. 28. 12.

Lib. 33. quæst. cap. 23.

3 Whosoeuer shall be framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past will murraure against God for their aduersities, nor lay vpon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the cause, but Iupiter and destinie : nor yet againe, as carried away with destinies, they will by desperation throwe themselves into destruction, as that young man in Plautus which said : Vnstable is the chauce of things : the Destinies driue men at their pleasure, I will get me to some rocke there to make an ende of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as another did) they will pretend the name of God to couer their owne mischieuous doings : for so saith Lycnides in another comedie : God was the mouer. I belecue it was the will of the gods : for if it had not bene their will, I know it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy Ghost, they may trauaile to attaine therunto. And also being ready to follow God, whither soeuer he calleth, they shew indeede that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Verie foolishly doe prophane men turmoile with their fondnesses, so that they in manner confound heauen and earth together as the saying is : If God haue marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it : then it is labor vaine lost in taking heed to our selues. Therefore, whereas one man dareth not venture to goe the way that he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murdered of the eues : another fendeth for Thistians, and wearieith himselfe with medicines to succour his life : another forbeareth grosse meates for feare of appairing his feeble health : another dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house. Finally, whereas men deuise alwaies and endeouour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or eis life and death, health and sicknesse, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they couet or hate them, doe by their trauaile endeouour to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lord to provide for those things which he hath already decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy all counsels that men doe take for time to come as things against the providence of God, which hath determined what he would haue done, without calling them to counsaile. And then whatsoeuer is already happened, they so impute it to the providence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to haue done it. As, hath a Ruffian slaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that was foreseene and ordained by the Lord, he is a minister of his providence. Hath the Sonne carelesse, neglecting all remedies, wayted for the death of his Father? he could not resist God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So all mitcheuous doings they call vertues, because they obey the ordinance of God.

4 But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purposos of men with the providence of God. For as he laugheth to some then folly, which boldly doe enterprise any thing without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hand: so in another place he speaketh in this manner: The hart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steppes, meaning that we are not hindered by the eternall Decrees of God, but that vnder his will we may both provide for our selues, and dispose althings belonging to vs. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limited our life within appointed bounds, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes and helps to preserve it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hande of dangers, and that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath giuen vs prouisions and remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our duetie, that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our duetie is to defend it. If he offer vs helps, our duetie is to vse them. If he shew vs dangers before, our duetie is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our duetie is not to neglect them. But no danger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fatall, which by all remedies cannot be overcome. But what if dangers be therefore not fatall, because God hath assigned the remedies to repulse and overcome them. See how thy maner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that danger is not to be taken heede of, because forasmuch as it is not fatall, we shall escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heede of it, because he will not haue it fatall vnto thee. These made men doe not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counsell and heede is inspired into men by God, whereby they may seise his providence in preserving of their own life: as on the other side by negligence and slouth they procure to themselves these euils that he hath appointed for them. For how cometh it to passe, that a circumspect man while he providedh for himselfe, doth wind himselfe out of euils that hang ouer him, and the foole perisheth by vnadvised rashnes, but for that both folly and wisdom are the instruments of Gods disposition on both parts? Therefore it pleased God to hide from vs all things to come, to this end that we should meete with them as things doubtfull, and not cease to set prepared remedies against them, till either they be overcome, or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished, that the Providence of God doth not alway shew it selfe naked, but as

The providence of God doth not shew it selfe naked, but it is hid from vs by lea-ving the endes, that we might take the wayes which are likely to bring vnto that end which wee should purpose to our selues.

God by vsing of means doth in a certaine manner clothe it.

5 The same men doe vnorderly and vnadvisedly draw the chaunces of time past to the naked prouidence of God. For because vpon it doe hang all things whatsoever happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor murders, nor slaughters, are committed without the will of God. Why taken (say they) their a theefe be punished, for that he spoyled him whom the Lords will was to punish with pouerty? Why shall the murtherer be punished which hath slaine him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe serue the will of God, why shall they be punished? But I deny that they serue the wil of God. For we may not say, that he which is carried with an euill minde doth serue vnto God as commander of it, where indeed he doth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enforced of his will doth labor to that ende, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enforced of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doing of things we must see that same will of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs only that which he commandeth. If we doe any thing against his commandement, it is not obedience but obstinacie and transgression. But vnalesse he would, we should not doe it. I graunt. But doe we euill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not commaunde vs to doe them, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but so raging with the intemperance of our owne lust, that of set purpose we bende our trauaile against him. And by these means in euill doing we serue his iust ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnes of his wisdom he hath good skill to vse euill instruments to doe good. And see how foolish is their maner of arguing. They would haue the doers vnpunished for mischieuous acts, because they are not committed but by the disposition of God. I graunt more: that theues and murtherers and other euill doers are the instruments of Gods prouidence, whom the Lord doth vse to execute those iudgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse thereby. For why? shall they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shall they couer their naughtines with his righteousnes? They can doe neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselues, they are accused by their owne conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they finde al the euil in theselues, and in him nothing but a lawfull vse of their euilnesse. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead carion, which hath bene both rotted and disclosed by heate of the sunne? All men doe see that it is raised by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doth therefore say, that the sunbeames doe stinke. So when there resteth in an euill man, the matter and guiltinesse of euill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vse their serueice at his pleasure? Away therefore with this doggish forwardnesse, which may indeede a farre off barke at the iustice of God, but cannot touch it.

6 But these cauillations or rather doting errors of phrentike men, shall easilie be shaken away, by godly and holy meditation of the prouidence, which the rule of godlinesse teacheth vs, so that thereof may grow vnto vs a good and most pleasant fruit. Therefore a Christian hart when it is most assuredly perswaded that all things come to passe by the disposition of God, and that nothing happeneth by chaunce, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cause of things, and yet will consider the inferior causes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the singular prouidence of God doth watch for his preseruacion, which prouidence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shall turne to his good and saluation. And because he hath to doe first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will assure himselfe that Gods prouidence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that all their counsels, wils, enterprises and powers

The prouidence of God doth not make the doers vnworthy of punishment.
Pro. 6. 9.

The sweete and safer meditation which a Christian man ought to haue of Gods prouidence.

powers are vnder the hand of God, so that it is in Gods will to bow them whither he list, and to restrain them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular prouidence of God doth keepe watch for the safetie of the faithfull, there are many and most euident promises to witnes. Cast thy burden vpon the Lord, and he shall nourish thee, and shall not suffer the righteous to fall for euer, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the help of the highest, shall abide in the protection of the God of heauen. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I will be thy shield, a brazen wal: I will be enemy to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principall entent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with such diligence keep the waies of the Saints, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore as a little before we haue rightfully reiected their opinion which do imagine an vniuersall prouidence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care of euerie creature: yet principally it shall be good to reknowledge the same special care toward our selues. Whereupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparrow of least value, doth fall to the ground without the will of the father, doth by & by apply it to this end, that we should consider that how much we be more worth than sparrows, with so much more care doth God prouide for vs, and he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to trust that the haies of our head are numbred. What can we wish our selues more, if not so much as a haire can fall from our head but by his wil? I speake not only of all mankind, but because God hath chosen his church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doth by singular examples shew his care in governing of it.

7 The seruant of God being strengthened with these both, promises and examples, will ioine with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their minds to good will, or to restrain their malice that it may do no hurt. For it is the Lord that gueth vs fauour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the maliciousnesse of our enemies, he knoweth how by diuers waies to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their witte from them, so that they can conceiue no sound or sober aduise, like as hee sent forth Saranto fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rechabem made by the young mens counsell, that he might be spoiled of his kingdome by his owne follie. Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet he maketh them so afraide and astonished, that they cannot will or go about that which they haue conceiued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to go about that which lust and rage did counsell them, he doth in convenient time breake off their violences, and fullereth them not to proceede to the ende that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophel that shoulde haue bene to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne all his creatures for the benefit and safetie of them that be his, yea, and to gouerne the diuell himselfe, which as we see durst enterprise nothing against Iob without his sufferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarily eniueeth both a thankfulness of minde in prosperous successe of things, and also patience in aduersitie, and an incredible assurednes against the time to come. Whatsoeuer therefore shall betide vnto him prosperously and according to his harts desire, al that he will ascribe vnto God, whether he feele the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by liuellesse creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lord which hath inclined their minds to me, which hath ioyned them vnto me to be instruments of his goodnes towards me. In plentie of the fruits of the earth, thus he will thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare hee fruits. In other things he will not doubt that it is the only blessing of the Lord, whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes he will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If any aduersitie happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his mind to God, whose hand auaieth much to imprint in vs a patience and quiet moderation of hart. If Ioseph had still conuined in recording the falschoode of his brethren, he could neuer haue taken a brotherly minde toward them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lord, he forgate the iniurie, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farre forth that of his owne accord he comforted his brethren and said: It is not you that soule me into Ægypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your liues. You indeed thought euill of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom he was troubled, he would foorthwith haue bene kindled to reuenge. But because he did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, he comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So Darius: when Semei had railed and cast stones at him, if he had looked vpon man, he would haue encouraged his souldiers to reacquite the iniurie. But because he vnderstoode that Semei did it not without the mouing of the Lord, he rather appeased them. Let him alone (saide he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse. With the same bridle in another place doth he restrain the intemperance of sorow. I held my peace (saith he) and became as dumbe, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectuall remedie against wrath and impatience: surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the prouidence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to striue against it, but also because he willesh nothing but that which is both iust and expedient. In summe this is the ende, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leauing their malice (which would doe nothing but enforce our sorow, and whet our minds to reuenge) should remember to climbe vp vnto God, and learne to beleeue assuredly, that whatsoever our enemy hath mischicuouly done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refraine vs from recompensing of iniuries doth wisely put vs in minde, that we are not to wrastle with flesh and blood, but with the spirituall enimie the Diuell, that we may prepare our selues to striue with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the Diuell as all wicked men to striue with vs, and that he siteth as Judge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that oppresse vs, doe chauce without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the Law: whatsoeuer is prosperous floweth from the fountaine of Gods blessing, and that all aduersities are his curtings: and let that most terrible warning make vs afraid: If ye walke stubbornly against me, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishness, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chauce that happeneth of both sorts, we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This same is the reason, why Hieremie and Amos did so sharply rebuke the Iewes, because they thought that things as well good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose serueth that sermon of Esay. I the God that create light, and fashion darkenesse, that make peace, and create euill: I God doe make all these things.

To beholde the hand of God in all things which we suffer, maketh vs both patient and penitent. Gen. 43. 8.

9 And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither will he, because he thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whom he hath receiued benefite, therefore let them passe vnconsidered, as though they had deserued no thanks by their gentlenesse: but he will hartily thinke himselfe bound vnto them, and will willingly confesse his bonde, and trauell as he shall be able, and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefites receiued hee will reuerence and praise God as the principall Author, but hee will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is indeed he will vnderstand that he is by the will of God bounde to them, by whose hand it was Gods will to be beneficiall vnto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, hee will determine in his minde, that the same was done indeede with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sicknesse whom he hath negligently handled, whereas of dunctie he should haue taken good heed vnto him, although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will hee not thereby lessen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his dunctie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is vsed any fraud, and conceived malice of minde in committing either murder or theft, will hee excuse it vnder pretence of Gods prouidence, but he will in one selfe euill act feuerally behold both the righteousness of God, & the wickednes of man, as both doth manifestly shewe themselves. But principally in things to come he will haue consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may vse for his lastitie. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slothfull in crauing their helpe whom he seeth to haue sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can anything profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vse as the lawfull instruments of Gods prouidence. And because he doth not certainly knowe what successe the busines will haue that he goeth about, (saying that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will provide for his benefit) he will with studie trauell to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so farre as he can conceiue in minde and vnderstanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be carried on by his owne wit, but will commit and yeelde himselfe to the wisdom of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he wil carelessly rest vpon them, or if he want them he will be afraid as left destitute, for he will haue his minde alway fastened vpon the Prouidence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawn away from the stedfast beholding thereof, by consideration of present things. So though Iob acknowledged that the successe of battell is in the will and hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slothfulness but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaue it vnto the Lord to gouerne the ende. We will stand valiant (saith he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his eyes. This knowledge shal detpoile vs of rashnes and wrongfull confidence, and shall driue vs to continuall calling vpon God: and also shall vphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doubt assuredly and boldly to despise those dangers that compass vs about.

The way to consider wisely of inferior and econd causes, is whether they be of things past or things to come.

every vniuers of our life bringeth, if our wits be not fortified in the knowledge of Gods prouidence.*

10 In this point doeth the inestimable felicitie of a godly minde shewe forth it selfe. Innumerable are the euils that doe beseege mans life, and doe threaten him so many deaths. As, not to go further than our selues: forasmuch as our bodie is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea, hath enclosed and doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not carrie himselfe but he must needs also carie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, and draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it elie be eailed, where he neither is cold, nor swieth without perill? Now whether focer thou turne thee, all things that are about thee are not onely vntruste friends to thee, but doe in manner openly threaten and seeme to shew thee present death. Goe into a ship, there is but a foote thickenes betweene thee and death. Sit on horsebacke, in the slipping of one foot thy life is in danger. Goe through the strettes of the citie: euen how many tiles are vpon the houises, to so many perils art thou subiect. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. How many walde beastes thou seeest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shutte vp thy selfe, euen in a garden well fenced, where may appeare nothing but pleasantesse of aire and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fire, doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertie, and in the night time with falling vpon thy head. Thy feelde, forasmuch as it lyeth open to haile, frost, drowth and other tempestes, it warneth thee of barrenesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisonings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part doe beseege vs at home, and part doe followe vs abroad. In these streights must not man neede be most miserable, which euen in life half dead doth plainly draw forth a carefull & fainting breath, as if he had a sworde continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chaunce seldome, or at the least not alwaies, nor to all men, and neuer all at once. I graunt, but seeing we are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to ourselues, and that our life ought of ductie no more to be free than theirs, it cannot be but that we must dread and feare them as things that may light vpon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearfulness? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproche of God to say, that he hath set open man the noblest of all his creatures to their blind and vnaduised strokes of fortune. But heere my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which he should feele if he should be brought subiect vnder Fortunes domination.

12 But when that light of Gods Prouidence hath once shined vpon a godly man: he is nowe releued and deliuered not onely from the extreim anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from all care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God, This is (I say) his comfort to vnderstande that the heavenly father doeth so holde in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authority and countenance, so ordereth them with his wisdom, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that he is receiued into Gods tuition, and committed to the charge of Angels; and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so far as it shall please God the gouernor to giue them place. For so is it sung in the Psalme. For hee shall deliuer thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysome pestilence. He will couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt be sure vnder his feathers. His truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraide of the feare of the night, nor of the arrow that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darknesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glorie. The Lord is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to mee. The Lorde is my protector, why shall I be afraide? If whole campes stande vp against mee, if I walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is neuer shaken away from them? but hereby, that where the worlde seemeth in shewe to be without order whirled about, they knowe that God worketh euerie where, whose worke they trust shall be for their preferuation. Nowe if their safetie be assailed either by the diuell or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Prouidence, they must needes by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the diuell and all the rout of the wicked, are so euery way holden in by the hande of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceiue any mischiefe against vs, nor goe about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they goe neuer so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farre as he shall suffer, yea, so farre as he shall commaund, and that they are not onely holden fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe seruice: here haue they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselues. For as it is the Lordes worke to arme their furie and to turne and direct it whither it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and end, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which persuasion Paul being established, did by the sufferance of God appoint his journey in another place which he saide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely saide that he had bene stopped by Satan, he shoulde haue seemed to giue him too much power, as if it had bene in Satans hande to ouerthrowe the verie purposes of God: but when he maketh God the iudge, vpon whose sufferance all iourneies do hang: he doth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoeuer he go about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doth Dauid, because for the sundrie chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were whirled about, he doth flie to this sanctuarie, saith that his times are in the hande of God. He might haue saide either the course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the worde Times, he meant to expresse that howsoeuer the state of man be visited last, whatsoeuer alterations do now and then happen, they are gouerned by God. For which cause Rahab, and the king of Israel, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as firebrands kindled to waste and consume the lande, are called by the Prophet smoking brands, which can doe nothing but breath out a little smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, strength and number of men, he himselfe is compared to a beaſt of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God saith that hee will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither hee list. Finallie, because I will not tarrie long vpon this point, if a man marke it hee shall easilie see that the extremitie of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Providence, and the cheefe blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

12 Concerning the Providence of God, this that is saide were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiositie of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they be satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwise than is aboue declared, that God hath not fixed aſt and stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that hee will repent him of the cull that hee had determined to laie vpon his people, so soone as he perceiueth any conuersion of them. Againe, there are rehearsed diuerse repeales of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Nininites, that after forty daies once past Ninive should be destroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esaie pronounced death to Ergubias, which hee was moued by his teares and prayers to deferre. Heere vpon manie do make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternal decree, but yecrely, daily, and hourelie appointeth this or that, as euery mans desertings are, or as he thinketh it equitie and iustice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to holde, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, error and weakenesse. For if no man doe wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the case that he neede to repent, wee can not saie that God doth repent, but that we must also saie, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot auoide it, or that he headlong and vnadvisedly ruaneth into a purpose whereof he by and by forethinketh him. But that it is so faire from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the verie mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, that in the same Chapter they are both so ioynd together, that the comparison doth verie well bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratiuely spoken, that God repented that he had made Saul king, by and by after it is added: The strength of Israel shall not be, nor shall be mooued with repenting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which wordes his vncchangeablenesse is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall and aboue all repentance. And that his constancie should not be doubtful, his very aduerſaries haue been compelled to beare him witnes. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not chooſe but buſt out into this ſaying, that he is not like a man to lie: nor as a ſonne of man to be changed, and that it is not poſſible that he ſhould not doe that he hath ſaid, and not fulfill whatſo euer he hath ſpoken. Num. 23. 19.

13 What meaneth then this name of repentance? euen in the ſame ſort that all the other phraſes of ſpeech which doe deſcribe God vnto vs after the maner of men. For, becauſe our weakneſſe doth not reach to his highneſſe, that deſcription of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed lowe to our capacite, that we might vnderſtand it. And this is the manner how to frame it lowe for vs, to paint out himſelfe not ſuch a one as he is in himſelfe, but ſuch a one as he is perceiued of vs. Whereas he himſelfe is without all moouing of a troubled minde, he yet teſtifieth that he is angrie with ſinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angrie, we ought not to imagine that there is any moouing at all in him, but rather to conſider that this ſpeech is borrowd of our cōmon ſenſe, becauſe God beareth a reſemblance of one chafed and angrie ſo oft as he exerciſeth iudgement: ſo ought we to vnderſtand nothing elſe by this worde of Repentance but a changing of deedes, becauſe men by changing of their deedes, are woont to declare that they miſlike them. Becauſe then euery change among men is an amendment of that which miſliketh them, and amendment cometh of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God chaungeth in his works. In the meane time yet neither is his purpoſe nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth on with one conuall couſe that which he had from eternitie foreſeene, allowed and decreed, howſo euer the alteration ſeeme ſudden in the eyes of men.

14 Neither doth the holic hitorie ſhow that Gods decrees were repelled when it ſheweth that the deſtruction was pardoned to the Ninuities which had bene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that conſtinue it are deceiued in vnderſtanding of the threatenings: which although they doe ſimply aſſume, yet by the ſucceſſe it ſhall be perceiued that they contained a ſecrete condition in them. For why did God ſende Jonas to the Ninuities to tell them aforehande of the ruine of their citie? Why did he by Iſay giue Ezechias warning of death? For he might haue brought to naught both him and them without ſending them any word of their deſtruction. He meant therefore another thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to ſee it comming a far off. Euen this he meant: not to haue them deſtroied, but to haue them amended that they ſhould not be deſtroied. Therefore that Jonas propheted that Ninive ſhould fall after fortie daies, was done to this ende that it ſhould not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpoſe that he might obtaine longer life. Nowe who doth not ſee that God meant by ſuch threatenings to awake them to repentance, whome he made afraid to the ende that they might eſcape the iudgement which they had deſerued by their ſinnes? If that be ſo agreed, the nature of the things themſelues doth leade vs to this, to vnderſtande in the ſimple threatening a ſecrete implied condition, which is alſo confirmed by like examples. The Lorde rebuking the king Aſimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, ſaith theſe wordes: Beholde thou ſhalt die for the woman that thou haſt taken, for ſhe hath a huſbande. But after hee had excuſed himſelfe, God ſaide thus: Reſtore the wife to her huſband, for he is a Prophet and ſhall pray for thee that thou maiſt liue. If not: knowe that thou ſhalt die the death and all that thou haſt. You ſee howe in his fiſt ſentence he vehemently ſaitheth strikes his minde to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amendes, and in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawn from the first purpose of God, by this that he made voide the thing which he had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishment he moueth those to repentance, whom his will is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his word, saying that he doth not expresse the same thing in syllables which is yet easie to vnderstand. For that saying of Esaie must needs remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoo it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

God is ſaid to repent himſelfe, not becauſe he chaungeth his purpoſe, but becauſe he chaungeth his vncchangeable purpoſe, as change.

Esaie. 14. 27.

The xvij. Chapter.

That God doth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so boweth their minds to put his iudgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

How God doth not onely permit but appoint the things to be done which wicked men do.

THere ariseth a harde question out of other places, where it is saide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiueth howe he working by them, shoulde not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and iustlie condemne his ministers. Vpon this was deuised the distinction betweene Dooing and Suffering: because many haue thought this doubt vnpossible to bee dissolued: that both Satan and all the wicked are so vnder the hande and power of God, that hee directeth their malice, vnto what ende it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked dooings to the executing of his iudgements. And their modestie were peraduenture excusable, whom the shewe of absurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they doe wrongfullie with a lying defence goe about to deliuer the iustice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them vnreasonable, that man should by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and so by and by be punished for his blindness. Therefore they seeke to scape by this shifte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth reiect that shifte. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secret commandement of God, and do trouble themselves in vaine with deliberating, vnlesse he doe by his secret direction stablish that which hee hath before determined, it is prooued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the dooings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there saide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelesse with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples will be more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Iob we knowe, that Satan doth no lesse appeere before God to receiue his commandements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In dedee it is after a diuerse manner and for a diuerse ende: but yet so that hee cannot goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterwarde to be added a bare sufferance of him to assist the holie man: yet because that saying is true: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that triall of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theecus were ministers. Satan goeth about to driue the holy man by desperation to madnesse. The Sabeans cruelly and wickedly do inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob knowledgeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoever men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their trauels to the executing of his iudgements. It was Gods will to haue the false king Ahab deceiued: the diuell offered his seruice thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commandement, to be a lying spūre in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madnesse of Ahab be the iudgement of God, then the deuile of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to saie, that the iudge doth onely suffer and not also decree what he will haue done, and command the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Jewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the souldiers to followe their raging lust, and yet in a solemne prair the disciples do confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hande and counsell of God had determined: euen as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose and foreknowledge of God deliued to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly and willingly appoint that which the Jewes did execute, as in another place hee rehearseth, that God which flowed before by all his Prophets that Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Asa- lon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adulterie, committed detestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the words are these: Thou hast done it secretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vsed in Iurie, was the worke of God. For which cause Agabus is called the seruant of God, God euery where crieth out that with his hissing, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commandement the wicked are stured vp to warre. He calleth the Assyrian the rod of his wrath, and the axe that he mouerh with his hande. The destruction of the holy citie and ruine of the temple hee calleth his worke. Dauid not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous iudge, yet conf. s. that the cursings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (saith he) commanded him to curle. We often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoever happeneth it cometh of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sons of Isr., and very manie things of like sort. They that be meanely exercised in the scriptures do see, that for shornesse sake, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle and talke fondly, that thinke in a bare Sufferance in place of the Providence of God, as though God sat in a watch Tower waiting for the chaunces of Fortune, and so his iudgements should hang vpon the will of men.

2 Now as concerning secret motions, that which Salomon speaketh of the hart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surelie to all mankinde, and is as much in effect as if he had saide: whatsoever wee conceiue in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to his end. And truly if he did not worke in the mindes of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakes, and wisdom from aged men, that he taketh the hart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. And heere to belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearefull so faine foorth as their harts be taken with his feare. So Dauid went out of the campe of Saul and none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where hee do oft pronounceth, that he blindeth the eyes of men, and slaketh them with gidnesse, that he maketh them drunke with the spūte of drownsesse, casteth them into madnes, and hardneth their harts. These things also many doe referre to sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate hee suffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is too fond, for inasmuch as the holie Ghost in plaine wordes expresseth, that they are fallen with blindness and madnes by the iust iudgement of God. It is said, that he hardened the hart of Pharao, also that he did make dull and strengthen it. Some doe with an vsuauorie cauilion mocke out these phrases of speech, because in another place it is saide, Pharao did harden his owne heart, there is his owne will set for the cause of his hardning. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in diuers maners, that man while he is moued in working by God, doth also worke himselfe. And I doe turne backe their obiection against themselves. For, if to harden do signifie but a bare sufferance, then the verie motion of obstinacie shall not be properly in Pharao. Nowe how weake and foolish were it so to expound, as if Pharao did onely suffer himselfe to be hardned? Moreover the Scripture cutteth off all occasions from such caulliations. For God saith, I will holde his heart. So of the inhabitants of the lande of Canaan, Moses saith, that they went forth to battell, because the Lorde had hardened their hearts. Which same thing is repeated by another Prophet, saying: Hee turned their hearts that they should hate his people. Againe in *Esai*e he saith, that he will send the Affyrians against the deceitfull nation, and will commaund them to carrie away the spoiles, and violently take the praie, not meaning that hee will teach wicked and obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bowe them to execute his iudgements as if they did beare his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appereth that they were moued by the certaine appointment of God. I graunt that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans seruice as a meane, but yet so that Satan doth his office by Gods mouing, and proceedeth so farre as is giuen him. The euill Spirit troubled Saul, but it is said that it was of God, that we may know that the madness of Saul, came of the iust vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blinde the mindes of the vnfaithfull: but how so, but onely because the effectuall working of errour commeth from God himselfe, to make them beleue lies that refuse to obey they truth? After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shal speake lyingly, I God haue deceiued him. According to the other manner of speech it is saide, that he giueth men into a reprobate minde: and to cast them into filthy desires, because he is the chiefe authour of his owne iust vengeance, and Satan is but onely a minister thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of free or bond will of man, I thinke I haue alreadye shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the will of God is saide to be the cause of all things, his Providence is thought the gouernesse in all purposes and workes of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not onely in the elect, which are governed by the holy Spirit, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

3 Forasmuch as hitherto I haue recited onely such things as are written in the Scriptures, plainly and not doubtfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to slander the heauenly oracles, take heed what manner of iudgement they take vpon them. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they seeke a praise of modesty, what can be imagined more proudly done, then to set one small worde against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to haue this touched. But if they openly speake euill, what preuaile they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no newe example of waywardnesse, because there haue bene in all ages wicked and vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thing indeed to be true, which long ago the holy ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that god may ouercome when he is iudged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbrideled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they doe not onely argue against God, but also take vpon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomit vpon against the heauen doe not reach vnto God, but that he driuing away the clouds of caulliations, doth brightly shewe forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded vpon the worde of God, it is about all the worlde) doth from her high place contemptuously looke downe vpon these mystes. For first, where they object, object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrarie wils, becauſe he decreeth thoſe things by ſecrete purpoſe, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is eaſily wiped away. But before I anſwere it, I will once againe giue the readers warning that this cauilation is thrown out not againſt me, but againſt the Holy Ghoſt, which taught the holy man Iob this confeſſion: as it pleaſed God, ſo it came to paſſe. When he was ſpoiled by the cues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurt that they did him, the juſt ſcourge of God. What ſaith the Scripture in other places? The ſonnes of Hij obeyed not their Father, becauſe it was Gods will to kill them. Alſo another Prophet crieth out, that God which ſitteth in heauen doth whatſoever he will. And now I haue ſhewed plainly ynough that God is the author of all thoſe things which thoſe iudges would haue to happen only by his idle ſuferance. He teſtifieth that he createth light and darkneſſe, that he formeth good and euill, that no cuill hapneth which he himſelfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I beſeech them, whether he doe willingly or againſt his will execute his owne iudgements? But as Mofes teacheth, that he which is ſlaine by the falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the ſtriker: ſo the whole Church ſaith in Luke, that Herod and Pilate conſpired to doe thoſe things, which the hand and purpoſe of God had decreed. And truly if Chriſt were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth ſtrike with it ſelfe, nor is changed, nor ſaith that he willet not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and ſimple in him, it ſeemeth to vs manifolde, becauſe according to the weakneſſe of our wit we conceiue not howe God in diuers maner willetth and willetth not one ſelfe thing. Paul, after that he hath ſaide, that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden myſterie, within a little after ſaith further, that in it was manifiſtly ſhewed the manifold wiſedome of God: becauſe for the dulneſſe of our wit the wiſedome of God ſeemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpreter hath tranſlated it) of many ſuſhons: ſhall we therefore dreame that there is any varietic in God himſelfe, as though he either changeth his purpoſe, or diſtineteth from himſelfe? Rather when we conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let vs call to minde our owne weakneſſe, and therewithall conſider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cauſe called inaceſſible, becauſe it is covered with darkneſſe. Therefore all godly and ſober men will eaſily agree to this ſentence of Auguſtine, that ſometime man with good will willetth that which God willetth not. As if a good ſonne willetth to haue his father to lue, whom God will haue to die. Againe it may come to paſſe, that man may wil the ſame thing with an euill will, which God willetth with a good will. As if an euill ſonne willetth to haue his father to die, and God alſo willetth the ſame. Now the fiſt of theſe two ſonnes willetth that which God willetth not, and the other ſonne willetth that which God alſo willetth, and yet the naturalneſſe of the fiſt ſonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willetth a contrarie thing, than the vnnaturalneſſe of the other ſonne that willetth the ſame thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, and to what ende the will of euerie one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or diſallowed. For thoſe things which God willetth well he bringeth to paſſe by the euill wils of euill men. But a litle before he had ſaide, that the Angels apoſtataes in their falling away, and all the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themſelues, did that which God would not; but in reſpect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no meanes ſo doe, becauſe while they did againſt the will of God, the will of God was done vpon them. Whereupon he crieth out. Great are the works of God, and ought to be ſought out of all them that loue them: that in marvellous maner the ſame thing is not done without his will which is alſo done againſt his will, becauſe it could not be done if he did not ſuffer it: and yet he doth it not againſt his will, but willingly: and he being good,

4 In the same manner is assailed or rather vanished away the other obiection: that if God doe not onely vse the seruice of wicked men, but also gouerneth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked dooings, and therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute that which God hath decreed because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confounde his will and commandement together, which it appeereth by innumerable examples to differ farre sunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers viues, it was Gods will to punish Dauid's adulterie with that dishonour: yet he did not therefore command the wicked sonne to commit incest, vnlesse perhaps you meane it in respect of Dauid, as he speaketh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, he doth not therein commend his obedience, as if that toward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his tooing to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to bee corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret iudgement, they are not to be excused, as though they disobey his commandement, which in deede of their owne euill lust they do purposely breake. Now how that thing is of God, and is ruled by his secret providence, which men doe wickedlie, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is severely condemned, for that they peruerced the order appointed by God, and falsly fell from the house of Dauid, and yet we know it was his will that he should be annointed. Whereupon in the verie wordes of Osé there appeereth a certaine shewe of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he saith, that hee gaue the kingdome to Iarobeam in his rage. Howe shall these sayings agree: that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, because neither coulde the people fall from the house of Dauid, but that they must shake off the yoke which God hath laide vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vthankfulness of Salomon. We see therefore how god in not willing false breach of alleagiance, yet to another ende iustlie willet a falling auaie from their Prince, whereupon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holie annointing druen to be king. After this manner doth the holie historie shew, that there was an enuier raised vp to spoyle Salomon sonne of part of his kingdome. Let the Readers diligently vnder both these things, because it hath pleased God to haue the people gouerned vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two parts, it was Jon against his will. And yet the diuision tooke beginning of his will. For surely whereas the Prophet both by words and ceremonie of annointing did moue Iarobeam when hee thought of no such thing, to hope of the kingdome, this was not done without the knowledge or against the will of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people iustly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of Dauid. In this manner it is also afterwarde further saide, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the request of the people, this was done by God, to confirme the worde which he had spoken by the hand of Ahab's his seruant. Lo how against Gods will the sacred vnitie is tome in sunder, and yet with the will of the same God ten tribes doe forsake Salomon's sonne. Let vs adde another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laymg their hands vnto it, the sons of Ahab were slaine, and all his offspring rooted out. Iehu said in deed truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the grounde, but that he had done all that hee had spoken by the hande of his seruant Elias. And yet not vnjustly hee rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are yee righte-teous, saith he? If I haue conspired against my Lord, who hath killed all these? I haue before (as I thinke) already declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousnes of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest wits this answer of Augustine shall alway suffice: whereas the father deliuered the sonne, and Christ deliuered his bodie, and Iudas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we now say, that there is no content of God with man, where man by the righteous mouing of God doth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine saith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these iudgements, where God worketh euen in the hearts of euill men whatsoever he will, and yet rendereth to them according to their deseruings? And truly in the falsehood of Iudas, it shall be no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deede to God, because he himselfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, than it shall be to giue away the praise of our redemption to Iudas. Therefore the same writer doth in an other place truly tell vs, that in this examination God doth not inquire what men might haue done, or what they haue done, but what their will was to do, that purpose and will may come into the accompt. They that thinke this hard, let them a little while consider, how tolerable their owne wywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by playne testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacitie, and do find fault that those things are vttered, which God, vnlesse he had knowen them profitable to be knowen, would neuer haue commanded to be taught by his Prophets and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meek willingnes to learne, and that without exception whatsoever is taught in the holy scriptures. As for them that do more ftowardly outrage in prating against it, such it is euident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer confutation.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which entreateth of the knowledge of God the redeemer in Christ which knowledge was first opened to the Fathers in the time of the Lawe, and then to vs in the Gospell.

The first Chapter.

That by Adams sin and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: wherem is intreated of Originall sin.

*We must learne thoroughly to know our selues thus the consideration of the graces of God may make vs shankefull, and the beholding of our miseries, humble

NO T without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe bene in the old Prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our selues: whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsell of any thing necessarie, we be miserably daseled, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heed, that we do not disorderly vse it, as we see some of the Philosopher haue done. For they in exhorting man to knowe himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he should knowe himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing else do they will him to beholde in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this point, that considering what was giuen vs in creation, and how bountifullly God continueth his gracious fauour toward vs, we may know how great had been the excellencie of our nature, if it continued vncorrupted: and we may withall thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as it were gotten by borrowing al that God hath bestowed vpon vs, that we may alwaies hang vpon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying and trust of our selues, ouerwhelme vs with shame, and truly humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his own image, to the end to raise vp our mindes both to the studie of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so least the so great noblenes of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulness, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reason & vnderstanding, that in keeping a holy & honest life, we should proceed on forward to the appointed ende of blessed immortalitie. But the first dignitie cannot come in our mind, but by and by on the other side the heauie sight of our filthines, and sharpe doth thrust it selfe in preiencce, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, wherupon groweth the hatred & loathing of our selues, and true humilitie, & there is kindled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom curey of vs may recouer those good things, wherof we are found altogether void and empty.

beare, and thus by*

2 This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of our selues, I meane, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs destitute of all matter to glorie vpon, may bring vs to submission. Which rule it behooueth vs to keepe, if we will attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good things, than to looke vpon our miserable needinesse and dishonor, which ought to ouerwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coueteth, than to be stroked with flatterie: and therefore when he heareth the giftes that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lightnesse of beleefe: whereby it is so much the lesse to be marueiled, that herein the greatest part of men haue perniciously erred. For sith there is naturally planted in all mortall men a more than blinde loue of themselues, they doe most willingly perswade themselues, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this most vaine opinion doth eche whene get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of himselfe to make himselfe liue well and blessedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, how focuer they graunt somewhat to God, least they should seeme arrogantly to take all to themselues, yet they so part it, that the principall matter of glory and confidence alway remaineth with themselues. Nowe if there come talke, that with hir allurements tickleth the pride that already of it selfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most fauorably aduanced the excellency of mans nature, so hath he bene excepted with the well liking reioycement in manner of all ages. But whatsoeuer such commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to rest in himselfe, it doth nothing but delite with that her sweetnesse, and indeede so deceiueth, that it bringeth to most wretched destruction all them that assent vnto it. For to what purpose aualeth it for vs, standing vpon all vaine confidence to deuise, appoint, attempt and goe about those things that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our first beginning of enterprise to be forsaken and destitute of sound vnderstanding and true strength, and yet to goe on I oldly till we fall downe into destruction? But it cannot otherwise happen to them that haue affiance that they can doe any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man giue heede to such teachers that hold vs in considering onely our owne good things, he shall not profite in learning to know himselfe, but shall be carried violently away into the worse kinde of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the second part of wisdome consisteth in the knowledge of our selues, yet in the very manner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the iudgement of the flesh, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe, when trusting vpon his owne vnderstanding and integritie, hee taketh boldnesse, and encourageth himselfe to doing the duties of vertue, and bidding battle to vices, trausileth with all his study to bende himselfe to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh vpon and trieth himselfe by the rule of Gods iudgement, findeth nothing that may raise vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoyled of all confidence, he leaueth to himselfe nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the first noblenesse that he gaue to our Father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteousnes and goodnesse. For we cannot consider either our own first estate, or to what ende we are created, but we shall be pricked forward to study vpon immortallitie, and to desire the Kingdome of God. For that consideration is so farre from putting vs in courage, that rather discouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humblenesse. For what is that first estate of ours? euen that from whence we are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euen the same from which

The true knowledge of our selues enuoldeneth not, but casteth downe: it teacheth vs what our duties is, and how unable we are to performe it.

Cap. I. Of the knowledge of

we are altogether turned away : so that loathing our owne miserable estate, we may grieve for sorrow, and in groaning may also sigh for the losse of that dignitie. But now when we say that man ought to beholde nothing in himselfe that may make him of bold courage: we mean that there is nothing in him, vpon affiance wherof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any list to heare what knowledge man ought to haue of himselfe, let vs thus diuide it, that first he consider to what end he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be despised, by which thought he may be stirred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him wey his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiuing wherof he may lye in extreme confusion, as one viterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that he may know what is his duetie : and the other, how much he is able to do towards the performing of it. We will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

Adams transgression proceeded from insubordination and vnsubrinitie, ended with reprochfull Apostasie from God.

4 But because it must needs be that it was not slight negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so severely punished, we must consider the very forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God vpon all mankind. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly bene received, concerning the intemperance of gluttony, as though the sum and head of all vertues consisted in the forbearing of one onely fruit, when there flowed one euerie side store of all sortes of demities that were to be desired, and when in that blessed fruitfulnessse of the earth, there was not onely plentie, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therefore we must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proue that he was willingly subiect to the gouernement of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commaundement was giuen for none other end, than for this, that he contented with his owne estate should not with wicked lust aduance himselfe higher. But the promise whereby hee was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as he did not eat of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatning of Death so soone as hee should tast of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, serued to prouoc and exercise his Faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what meanes Adam prouoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine in deede saith not amisse, when he saith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull and than was permitted him, he might haue continued in his estate : but we must fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For sith the woman was with the deceite of the Serpent led away by infidelitie, newie appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were lost by one mans disobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the first man fell from the subiection of God, for that he not onely was taken with the enticements of Satan, but alio despising the truth, did turne out of the way to lying. And surely Gods word being once despised, all reuerence of God is shaken off. Because his maiestie doth no other waies abide in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inuiolate, but while we hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the roote of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulnessse, for that Adam in coueting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently despite the so great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous v. irkednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that he was made after the likenesse of God, vntill he might also be made equall with God. If Apostasie be a filthy and detestable offence, whereby man draweth himselfe from the allegiance of his Creator, yea, outragiously shaketh off his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the sinne of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apostasie, but roynded with shamefull reproches against God, while they

Rom. 5. 19.

*reprobation of man
is the cause of the fall*

they assented to the sleaunders of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying, enuie, and niggardly grudging, Finally, infidelitie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the feare of God, and throw themselves whither their lust carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of saluation is opened vnto vs, when at this day we receiue the Gospell by our eares: euen as by the same windowes, when they stood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would neuer haue beene so bold, as to doe against the commandement of God, but for this, that he did not beleeuē his worde. Truly this was the best bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe righteousnesse in obeying the commandments of God, and then that the chiefe ende of happy life is to be beloued of him. He therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the diuell, did (asmuch as in him lay) extinguisht the whole glory of God.

5 As the spirituall life of Adam was, to abide ioyned and bounde to his Creator, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it maruile if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posteritie, which peruerted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures doe grone, saith Paule, being made subiect to corruption against their will. If one should aske the cause: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment that man deserued, for whose vse they were created. Sith then the curse that goeth throughout al the coastes of the world, proceeded from his fault both vpward and downwarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heauenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wisdom, strength, holinesse, truth, and iustice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the most horrible peitilences, blindnesse, weaknesse, filthinesse, fallsthood, and iniustice, but also he entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the same miseries. This is the corruption that commeth by inhericance, which the olde writers called originall sinne, meaning by this worde sinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they haue had much contention, because there is nothing further off from common reason, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which seemeth to haue beene the cause why the oldest Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was conuenient. And yet that fearefulnesse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophane inuention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne losse, and hurted not his posteritie. So through this subtletie, Satan went about by hiding the disease, to make it incurable. But when it was proued by manifest testimony of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, hee brought this cauillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men trauiailed in this point, and aboue all other Augustine, to shew that we are corrupted not by foreine wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to deny was too great shamelesnesse. But the rashnes of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme maruellous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shall perceiue, how shamelesse beastes they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubtfully spoken that Dauid confesseth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceiued in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodnesse of God toward him, he beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begetting. Forasmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to Dauid alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankind is noted vnder his example. All we therefore that descende of vnclane seede, are borne infected with the contagion of sinne, yea, before that we see the

6 Wee heare that the vncleannesse of the parents so passeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning vnclesse we go vpp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankind worthily corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he) by one man sinne entred into the whole world, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteousnesse and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians heere prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue wee no other profite by the righteousnesse of Christ, but that hee is an example set before vs to followe? Who can abide such robberie of Gods honour? If it be out of question that Christs righteousnesse is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth also that they both were so lost in Adam, as they be recovered in Christ: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him, and Christ with his grace restored vs to saluation. In so cleere light of truth, I thinke we neede not a longer or more laborous prooffe. So also in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, when he goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of the resurrection, he sheweth that the life is recovered in Christ, that was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth also therewithall plainly testifie, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reach vnto them that were touched with no guiltinesse of iniquite. But it can be no way plainlier vnderstanded what hee meaneth then by relation of the other member of the sentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough knowne that the same is done no other way, than when by marvellous manner of communicating, Christ powreth into vs the force of his righteousnes. As it is written in another place, that the spirite is life vnto vs, for righteousnesse sake. Therefore we may not otherwise expound that which is said that we are dead in Adam, but thus: that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischief and ruine to himselfe, but also threw downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected all his seed with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Pauls could not stand true, that all are by nature the sonnes of wrath, if they were not alreadye accursed in the wombe. And it is easily gathered that nature is there meant not such as it was created by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient, that God should be made the author of death. Adam therefore so corrupted himselfe, that the infection passed from him into all his offspring. And the heavenly iudge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly enough pronounce, that all are borne euil and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatsoever is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

7 Neither for the vnderstanding thereof is any curious disputation needfull, which not a little combed the old writers, whether the soule of the sonne doe proceede by demerit from the soule of the father, because in it the infection principally resteth. Wee must be content with this, that such giftes as it pleased the Lorde to haue bestowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after he had receiued them, he lost them not onely from

from himselfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be carefull of a conuycance from soule to soule, when he shall heare that Adam receiued these ornaments which he lost, no lesse for vs than for himselfe? that they were not giuen to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not against reason, if he being s^oyle- led, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottenesse into the other twigges that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the father, that they also were infectiue to their children: that is to say, so was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continuall flowing from one to another, it is conuyced from the ancestors into the posteritie. For the infection hath not her cause in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was so ordeined of God, that such giftes as he had giuen to the first man, man should both haue them, and lose them as well for himselfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe caull, that it is not likely that the children doe take conuption from godly parents, sith they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleanness, that is easily confuted. For they descend not of their spirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine saith, whether the vnbeleuer be condemned as guiltie, and the beleuer quitte as innocent, they both doe beget not innocents, but guiltie, because they beget of the corrupted nature. Now where as they doe in manner partake of the parents holinesse, that is the speciall blessing of the people of God, which proueth not but that the first and vniuersall curse of mankind went before. For of nature is guiltinesse, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8 And to the ende that these things be not spoken of a thing vncertaine and vknownen, let vs define Originall sinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring foorth one onely, which I thinke to be most agreeable with truth. Originall sinne therefore seemeth to be the inheritably descending peruerfnesse and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the partes of the soule, which first maketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth foorth these workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the flesh: and that is it properly that Paul oftentimes calleth sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, theftes, hatreds, murders, banquetings, after the same manner he calleth the fruites of sinne, albeit they are likewise called finnes both commonly in the Scriptures, and also by the same Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctly to be noted: that is, that being so in all partes of our nature corrupted and peruerted, we are now euen for such corruption onely holden worthyly damned and conuicted before God, to whome is nothing acceptable but righteousnesse, innocencie and purenesse. And yet is not that bonde in respect of anothers fault. For where it is said, that by the sinne of Adam we are made subiect to the iudgement of God, it is not so to be taken, as if we innocent and vnderferung did beare the blame of his fault. But because of his offending we are all clothed with the curse, therefore is it saide that hee hath bounde vs. Neuertheless, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection distilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is iustly due. Wherefore how so euer Augustine doth oftentimes call it an others sinne, (to shew the more plainly, that it is conuyced into vs by propagation) yet doth he also affirme withall that it is proper to every one. And the Apostle himselfe expressly witnesseth, that therefore death came vpon all men, because all men haue sinned, and are wrapped in Originall sinne, and defiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the very infantes themselues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by anothers, but by their owne fault. For though they haue not as yet brought that what God bestowed vpon Adam, was vs to hold, or to lose, for, or from, both himselfe and vs. That the children of faith shall men are sanctified, v no disproofe of their originall corruption.

What originall sin is, and that we are not onely subiect to the punishment which our first fathers haue deserved, but the infection of his fault is also in vs.

Gal. 5. 19.

Rom. 5. 12.

foorth the fruits of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the seede thereof encloused within them: yea, their whole nature is a certaine seed of sinne: therefore it cannot be but hateful and abhominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly accounted sinne before God: for there could be no guiltines without sin. The other point is, that thus peruerfnesse neuer ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth foorth new fruits, euen the same workes of the flesh that we haue before described: like as a burning furnace bloweth out flame and sparkles, or as a spring doth without ceasing cast out water. Therefore they which haue defined Originall sinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteousnes which ought to haue beene in vs, although in deed they comprehend all that is in the thing it selfe: yet they haue not fully enough expressed the force and efficacie thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodnesse, but also is so plenteous and fruitfull of all euils, that it cannot be idle. They that haue saide, that it is a concupiscence, haue vsed a worde not very far from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the most part, that whatsoeuer is in man, euen from the vnderstanding to the will, from the soule to the flesh, is corrupted and stuffed full with this concupiscence: or, to end it shorter, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupiscence.

9 Wherefore, I haue saide that all the parts of the soule are possessed of sinne, sith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteousness. For not onely the inferior appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possessed the very castle of his mind, and pride peared to the innermost part of his heart. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restrain the corruption that proceeded from thence, only to the sensuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouiture that allureth, stuteth and draweth to sinne onely that part, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath disclosed his grosse ignorance, which seeking & searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paul witnesseth, not properly in deede, but because it more appeareth in the flesh, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace: And Paul there taketh away all doubt: teaching that corruption resteth not in one part alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but specially trauelleth to prouue that the vnderstanding minde is subiect to blindness, and the hart to peruerfnesse. And the same third Chapter to the Romanes is nothing else but a description of originall sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirit which is compared with the old man and the flesh, doth not onely signifie the grace whereby the inferior or sensuall part of the soule is amended, but also containeth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth commaund, not onely that our grosse appetites be brought to naught, but also that we our selues be renewed in the spirit of our minde, as likewise in another place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newnesse of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the same part, wherein most of all shineth the excellencie and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a new nature. How farre sinne possideth both the vnderstanding minde and the heart, we will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foot is so ouerwhelmed as with an ouerflowing of water, that no part of him is free from sinne, and that therefore whatsoeuer proceedeth from him is accounted for sinne, as Paul saith, that all the affections of the flesh or thoughts are enmities against God, and therefore death.

Though we be naturally sinfull yet is not said the author of our sin.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sinnes, because we say that men are naturally sinfull. They doe wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthines, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet found and vncorrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne flesh and not of God, forasmuch as we perished by no other meane but by this, that we degreded from our first estate. But yet let not any man heere murmure and saie, that God might haue better foreseene for our saluation, if he had prouided that Adam shoulde not haue fallen. For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godlie mindes, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination, which shall after bee entreated of in place conuenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in decde it is, that the same deadly wounde sticketh fast in nature: but it is much materiall to know, whether it came into nature from elswhere, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is euident that the wounde was given by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why wee shoulde complaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This haue I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they haue sought manie inuentions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as hauing gotten vprightnesse by the goodnesse of God, he by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

Ecc. 7. 13.

¶ We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. We denie that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeere that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall proprietie that hath bene put into him from the beginning. Yct we call it Naturall, that no man shoulde thinke that euery man getteth it by euill custome, whereas it holdeth all men bounde by inheritably descending right. And this we do not of our owne heads without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath, Howe could God, whom all his meancst workes do please, be wrathfull against the noblest of all his creatures? But he is rather wrathfull against the corruption of his worke, than against his worke it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vntruly saide to be by nature abominable to God, it shall bee also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the finnes naturall, which doe necessarily raigne in our flesh where the grace of God is absent. So vanisheth away the foolish trifling deuisse of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse hauing substance in man, presumed to forge for him a new Creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous god the cause and beginning of euill.

We are termed corrupte by nature not because God hath put corruption as a naturall qualitie in vs, but because together with our nature it is deuised vnto vs and not gotten by custome.
Eph. 2. 3.

The second Chapter.

That man is now spoiled of the Freedome of will, and made subiect to miserable bondage.

Sith we haue scene, that the dominion of sinne, since the time that it held the first man bound vnto it, doth not onely reigne in all mankind, but also wholly possesseth euery soule: now must we more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoiled of all freedome or no: and if yet there remaine anie parcell, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the ende that the truth of this question may more easily appeere vnto vs, I will by the waye set vp a marke, wherunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shall be the best waie to auoide crour, if the dangers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from all vprightnesse, by and by he thereby taketh occasion of slouthfulness: and because it is saide, that by himselfe he can doe nothing to the studie of righteoussnes,

The doctrine which concerneth the bondage of our will, must not make vs slothfull vnto good things, as if they did not appertaine vnto vs, but rather liuible and carefull, that knowing our owne weakness, we presume not to trust vnto our selues.

teousnes, soorthwith hee neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing vnto him. Again, he can presume to take nothing vpon himself, be it neuer so litle, but that both Gods honour shall be thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be ouerthrowne with rash confidence. Therefore to the ende we strike not vpon these rockes, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodnes, and being on euery side compassed about with most miserable necessitie, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is voide, and to the libertie whereof he is deprived, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulness, than if it were fained that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessarie this second point is, euery man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as farre as it behooueth that he be thrown downe from false boasting of himselfe. For if it were not graunted to man to glory in himselfe euen at that time, when by the bountifullnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornaments, how much ought he now to be humbled, such for his vntankfulness: he is thrust downe from his glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I saie) when he was aduanced to the highest degree of honour, the Scripture attribureth nothing else vnto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it secretly teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and destitute of all glorie, do acknowledge God, to whose liberalitie he could not be thankful when he flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne pouertie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profit, that all praise of wisdom and strength be taken from vs, as it pertaineth to the glorie of God that they ioyne our ruine with the robbrie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when we are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on hie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men haue imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather throwne downe headlong, than established by them that defende it. This I thought needfull to speake before, as by waie of Preface for manie mens sakes, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowne from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, doe much hate this manner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeereth to be both in religion necessarie, and for vs most profitable.

2 Whereas we haue a litle before said, th in the vnderstanding minde, and in the hart are placed the powers of the soule, nowe let vs consider what they both are able to do. The Philosophers indeed with great consent do imagine that in the vnderstanding minde sitteth reason, which like a lampe giueth light to all counsels, and like a Queene gouerneth the will, for they say that it is so endued with diuine light, that it can giue good counsell, and so excelleth in liuely force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other side, that sense is dull and beare cied, that it alway creepeth on the ground, and walloweth in grosse objects, and neuer lifteth vp it selfe to true insight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yeelde it selfe to sense to be subdued, is carried on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, & is transformed into will: but if it giue it selfe subiect into the bondage of sense, it is by it corrupted and peruerted, so that it degendeth into lust. And whereas by their opinion there do sit in the soule those powers that I haue spoken of before, vnderstanding, sense, appetite or will, which worde will is now more commonly vsed, they

Philosophers concerning the freedom of mans will.*

say that vnderstanding is endued with reason, the best gouernesse towarde good and blessed life, so that it doe hold it selfe within his owne excellencie, and thew foorth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called sense, wherewith man is drawne to error and deceit, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason, and by litle & litle be vanquished. They place will in the midst between reason and sense, as a thing at her owne ordering, & hauing libertie whether it list to obey to reason, or giue foorth it selfe to be rauished by sense.

4 Among the Ecclesiasticall writers, albeit there haue bene none that did not acknowledge both that the foundnesse of reason in man hath bene sore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much assented to the Philosophers, of which the auncient, as I thinke, did so much aduance the strength of man vpon this consideration, least if they should haue expressly confessed his weakenesse, first they should haue made the Philoso- phers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then least they should giue to the flesh, which of it selfe was dull to goodnesse, a new occasion of slothful- nesse. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurditie in the common iudgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scrip- ture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that seconde point, not to make place for slothfulnesse, appeereth by their owne words. Chrysostome hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill things in our owne power, hee hath giuen vs Freedom of election, and he withholdeth not the vnywilling, but embraceth the willing. Againe, oftentimes he th it is euill, if hee will, is turned into good, and hee that is good by slothfulnesse falleth and becommeth euill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layeth not necessitie vpon vs, but giuing conuenient remedies, suffreth all to lie in the minde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse we be holpen by the grace of God, we can neuer doe any thing well : so vnlesse we bring that which is our owne, we cannot obtaine the fauour of God. And he had saide before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierom saith, that it is our part to begin, but Gods to make an ende : our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see now that in these sayings they gaue to man towarde the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dullnesse that was naturally in vs. But if they did prooue that in it onely we sinned, with what apt handling they haue done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeere. Now although the Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrysostome haue passed measure in aduancing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or wauer, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore wee will not tarrie vpon exact reckoning of euerie one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of euerie one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euerie one for himselfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worfe and worfe, till it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted onely in his sensuall part, and to haue reason altogether, and will for the more part vncorrupted. In the meane time this flew about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundredth man did euen slightly vnderstand. As for my part, if I would plainly shewe of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be heedefully wryed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoyled of his supernaturall giftes, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselues to be the disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Free will still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vncorrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the word much more arrogantly : For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe. Because therefore all, euen to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Free will, and many of them that would seeme excellent, cannot tell how farre it extendeth : first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, and then let vs proceede on by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shew what man is able to doe of his owne nature, toward good or euill. What Free wil is, whereas it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet fewe haue defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he saide, that it is a power of reason to discern good or euill, and a power of will to chooseth either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth, that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euill when grace ceaseth. Bernard, while he meaneth to speake more subtely, speaketh more darkly, which saith, that it is a consent by reason of the libertie of will that cannot be lost, and the iudgement of reason that cannot be auoyded. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar ynough, which saith that it is a power to keepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Schoolemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they sawe that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of their owne such things as they thought either to be better, or to serue for plainer declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to be referred to reason, whose part is to discern betweene good and euill things: and the adiectiue Free, pertaineth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, such Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas saith, that it would verie well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of vnderstanding and appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue wee in what things they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to saie, in reason and will. Now remaineth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

5 They are commonly wont to make subiect to the free determination of man, things meane, that is, which belong not to the kingdome of God: but they do referre true rightcouines to the speciall grace of God and spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the authour of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shewe, he reckoneth vpon three sorts of Willes, the first Sensitiue, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he saith, that man hath the first two at his owne liberty, the last is the worke of the holie Ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shall be entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of free will they principally seeke not what it is able to do to ciuill or outward doings, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shew a good reason. There hath bene a distinction receiued in Schooles, that reckoneth vpon three sorts of freedomes, the first, from necessitie, the second from sinne, the third from miserie. Of which the first is naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sinne. This distinction I willingly receiue, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfully confounded with compulsion: betweene which two how much difference there is, and how necessitie that difference is to be considered, shall appeere in another place.

Amblib. 1. cap. 2.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controuersie that man hath not free will to do good workes, vntill he bee holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe vpon these phrantike men, which babble that grace is effred generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether deprived of power to doe well, or whether he haue yet some power, although it be but little and weake, which by it selfe in deede can doe nothing, but by helpe of grace doth also her part. While the Master of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he saith there are two sorts of grace necessarie for vs, whereby wee may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby we effectually will to do good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which diuision this I mislike, that while he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly sheweth his meaning that man aieadie of his owne nature, after a certaine manner, desireth good though vneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is indeede the worke of God, yet thus he graunteth to man, that of his owne motion he desireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Thomas would seeme to haue borrowed this diuision. In the second part of the diuision, the doubtfulnes of speech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore worke together with the second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make void the first grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the authour of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus expresse it, that it is free for them that vse the iudgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be woorthie reward not to haue departed, and that the thing which coulde not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to haue not bene done. These two things I had wil to note by the way, that nowe, Reader, thou maist see howe much I dissent from the soundest sort of the schoolemen. For I doe much farther differ from the later Soplitters, euen so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sort as it is, they perceiue by this diuision, after what manner they haue giuen free will to man. For at length Lombard faith, that we haue not free wil therefore, because we are alike able either to do or to thinke good and euill, but only that we are free from compulsion: which freedom is not hindered, although we be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, and can doe nothing but sinne.

Lib. 3. dist. 25.

The danger of using the name of free will though we take it in a harmlesse meaning.

7 Therefore, man shall be saide to haue free will after this sort, not because he hath a free choise as well of good as of euill, but because he doth euill by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well said: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proud a title? A goodly libertie forsooth, if man be not compelled to serue sinne: so is he yet a willing seruant that his will is holden fast bound with the fetters of sinne. Truly I do abhorre struing about words wherewith the church is vanelly wearied, but I thinke that such words are with great religious carefaine to be taken heed of, which sound of any absurditie, especially where the erroure is hurtfull. How few I pray you, are there, which when they heare that free will is assigned to man, do not by and by conceiue, that he is Lord both of his own minde & wil, & that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether part he will? But some one will say: that peril shall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsitie, he wil sooner conceiue an error of one little worde, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in manner that came after, while they stick vpon the naturall signification of the worde, haue been carried into a trust of themselves that bringeth them to destruction.

apt man is to accuse error

S. Augustines meaning when he useth the name of free will is sounde and good.

8 But if the authoritie of the fathers do moue vs, they haue indeed continually the word in their mouth: but they doe without declare, how much they esteeme the vse of it. First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angry with them that denie free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he saith onely, Let not any man be so bold to denie the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in another place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do binde and conquer it. Againe, that when will was overcome with sinne, whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Againe, that man hauing ill vsed his free will, lost both himselfe and it. Againe, free will is become captiue, that it can doe nothing towarde righteousnesse. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that the iustice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendreth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man receiued great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that hee had shewed that free will is established by grace, he shapely inueyeth against them that take it vpon them without grace. Why the fote (saith he) dare wretched men either be proude of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the verie name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the spirite of the Lorde is, there is freedome. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why doe they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondseruants, which saith: With ut me yee can doe nothing? Beside that also in another place he seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he saide, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondseruant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousnesse, but by choise of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Sauiour. Hee that doeth refuse, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousnesse, seemeth trimly to mocke at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by me for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefite to the Church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would with other, if they aske me counsell, to forbear it.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great prejudice against my selfe, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doubtfully or diuersly in this matter, that no certaintie can be had out of their writings. For some will to construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giuing any voice herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other ende but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wits prouided for, which if they waite vpon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway wauer vncertaine. In such sort doe they sometime teach, man being spoiled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeere, that in such doubtfulnesse of speech, they nothing, or very little esteeming mans strength, haue giuen the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certaine sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so often repeated, that we ought to glorie of nothing, because we haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoyled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vpon God? What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whome he that reacheth his hand, shall liue? and that the tree of knowledge of good and euill, is the free choise of will, whereof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall die? What meaneth that of Crysostom, that euery man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we haue no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the profite of a good worke betwene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should caull, that I choose out those things onely that make for my purpose, and doe craftily leaue out such things as make against me, therefore I doe forbear such rehearfall. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoeuer they be sometime too busie in aduancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strength reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

10. But I am here constrained to reapeate that, which in the beginning of this Chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and thrown downe with confidence of his owne merite, needlesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath he best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, least man will take too much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what hee wanteth is to be recovered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his owne right, be it neuer so little, but that he shall despoyle himselfe with vaine confidence, and conueying the honour of God to himselfe, become guiltie of hainous sacrilege.

A dangerous thing for man to haue an opinion of his owne strength, a blessed thing to knowe in the sense and feeling of his owne powerie and onwarde weaknes.

Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of

And truly so oft as this lust inuadeth our minde, that we desire to haue somewhat of our owne, which may rest in our selues rather than in God, let vs knowe that this thought is ministred vs by no other counseller, but by him that perswaded our first parents, to haue a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. If it be the word of the diuell that raiseh vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vnlesse we list to take counsell of our enemy. It is pleasant in deede, for a man to haue so much strength of his owne, that he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine assurance, let so many sore sentences make vs afraide, by which we be throwen downe: as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in man, and setteth flesh to be his arme. Again, that God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, and attend vpon his mercie. Again, that it is he which giueth strength vnto him that fainteth, and vnto him that hath no strength, he increaseth power, euen the yoong men shall faint and be wearie, and the yoong men shall stumble and fall, but they that waite vpon the Lord, shall renew their strength. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strength, be it neuer so little, if we meane to haue God fauourable vnto vs, which resisteth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble. And then againe, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will poure out water vpon the thirtie, and Floods vpon the drie ground. Againe, ail ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises doe testifie, that none are admitted to receiue the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne poueritie. And such promises are not to be passed ouer, as is that of Isay: Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine euerlasting light, and the God thy glorie. The Lorde in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his seruants, but because he will himselfe alone appeere gloriously in them, he caltch their confidence far away, euen from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

11 Truly, that saying of Chrysostome hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisedome is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, as (saeth he) that same Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the seconde, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the third, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske me of the rules of Christian religion, the first, the Second, and Thirde time, and alwaies I would answer Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some little vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and haughtinesse of minde, but when he truly feelth himselfe to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place he declareth. Let no man (saeth he) batter himselfe: of his owne he is a diuell. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteousnesse is Gods. Againe, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maimed, troubled and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defence. Againe, when euery man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe he hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the wars are ceased. But it is needefull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shiured in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. How much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receiveth thee. So vpon the threescore and ten Psalme he forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteousnesse, that we may acknowledge the righteousnesse of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commend his grace vnto vs, that we may knowe our selues to be nothing, that we stande onely by the mercie of God, when of our selues we are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore strue heere with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our saluation which is giuen to him. For as our humblenes is his highnes, so the confession of our humblenes hath his mercie readie for remedie. Neither yet do I require that man not conuincd should willingly yeeld himselfe: nor if he hath any power, that he should turne his minde from it; to be subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the disease of selfeloue and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, he thinketh too highly of himselfe, he should well consider himselfe in the true looking glasse of the Scripture.

12 And the common saying which they haue borrowed out of Augustine pleaseth me well, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made emptie. For in this latter part of supernaturall giftes, they vnderstand as well the light of faith as of righteoulnesse, which were sufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternall felicitie. Therefore bawshing himselfe from the kingdome of God, he was also deprivued of the spirituall giftes, wherewith he had been furnished to the hope of eternall saluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdome of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, vntill by grace of regeneration he recover them. Of that sort are faith, the loue of God, charitie towarde our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteoulnesse. All these things, because Christ restoreth them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Againe, foundnes of the vnderstanding minde and yprightnes of hart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall giftes. For though there remaine somewhat left of vnderstanding and iudgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our vnderstanding is sound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesse. And as for our will, the perversnes thereof is more than sufficiently knowne. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth betwene good and euill, whereby he vnderstandeth and iudgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether destroyed, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that soule ruines thereof appeare. In this sense doth Iohn say, that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not. In which wordes both things are plainly expressed, that in the perverted and degendred nature of man, there shine yet some some sparks that shew that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from bruite beasts, because he is indued with vnderstanding: and yet that this light is choked with great thicknes of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, because it is vnseparable from the nature of man, perished not, but was bounde to peruerse desires, that it can couer no good thing. This in deede is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceede according to that first distinction, wherein we deuided the soule of man into vnderstanding and will: let vs first examine the force of vnderstanding. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindness, that a man leaue vnto it no maner of skill in any kind of things, is not onely against the word of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For wee see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out truth, to which he woulde not aspire at all, but hauing felt some fauour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans vnderstanding, that he is naturally drawn with loue of truth, the neglecting wherof, in brute beastes prooueth a grosse sense without reason, albeit, this little desire, such as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the witte of man cannot for dullnesse keepe the right way to search out truth, but strayeth in diuers errors, and as it were groping in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanish away, so in seeking truth, it doeth bewray howe vnfit it is to seeke and find truth. And then it is sore troubled with another vanitie, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge wherof it were expedient to Man through sinne was made emptie of supernaturall giftes, as faith, loue, righteoulnesse: naturall, as both vnderstanding and will, though they be not quite taken away, yet the soundnesse of them is lost: the vnfoundnesse of his vnderstanding may be seene both by his ofte straying in that which he seeketh, and his not seeking that which belongeth most vnto him.

Iohn. 1. 5.

bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with sonde curiositie, in searching out things superfluous and nothing woorth: and to things most necessarie to bee knownen, it either taketh no heede, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarce at any time applyeth her studie earnestly vnto them. Of which puerfenselle, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is founde, that all men haue entangled themselues with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all these studies, in which men thinke themselves to bee verie wise, yet hee pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

Mans natural capacity may attain to the knowledge of things belozing to this present life. As first there are in all mens mindes certaine seedes of vnderstanding these things, which in ciuill order & police is grounded.

13 Yet doe not all trauailes of Witte so alway become voide, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferiour things. Yea, and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some little of the higher things, howsoeuer it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vp about the compasse of this present life, then is it principally conuincd of her owne weakensse. Wherefore, that we may the better see howe farre according to the degrees of her abilitie, it proceedeth in euery thing, it is good that I put forth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one vnderstanding of earthly things, an other of heavenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concerne God and his kingdome, true righteousnesse and the blessednesse of eternall life, but haue all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were contained within the boundes thereof. Heavenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heavenly kingdome. Of the first sort are policie, gouernance of householde, all handie crafts, and liberall Sciences. Of the second sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies together: he is also by naturall instinct bent to cherish and to preserve the fellowshippe of these companies, therefore wee see that there are in the mindes of all men vniuersall impressions of a certaine ciuill honestie and order. Heereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that vnderstandeth not; that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiucth not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Heereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vnto lawes, because the seedes thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weye not the dissensions and fightings that afterward arise while some desire to peruert lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernement of Kings, that lust strayeth abroade in steede of right, as theeues and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be vniust, which other haue established for iust: and on the other side stiffely say, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men do not therefore hare lawes, because they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie lust, doe fight againt manifest reason, and for their fanisie doe abhorre that, which in vnderstanding of minde they allowe. The later sort of it struing in such, that taketh not away the first conceiuing of equitie. For when men do liue among themselues, concerning the points of lawes, they agree together in a certaine summe of equitie. Wherein is proued the weakenesse of mans wit, which euen then when it seemeth to followe the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but still this remaineth true, that there is sowne in all men a certaine seede of politike order. And that is a large prooffe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is voide of the light of reason.

Men haue naturall instinct to liue in societies to lawes

14 Nowe do followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doeth appeare

peare the force of mans witte: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no man found, whose conceite of witte doth not in some arte or other shew forth it selfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facilitie to learne, but also to deuise in euery arte some new thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath been learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it moued Plato eroniously to teach, that such conceiuing is nothing else, but a calling to remembrance, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confesse, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. These pointes therefore doe plainly testifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuersall conceiuing of reason and of vnderstanding. Yet is it so an vniuersall benefit, that therein euery man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankfullt the creator himselfe doth sufficiently awake vs, when he createth naturall fooles, in whome he maketh vs to see with what giftes mans soule excelleth, if it be not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberalitie towards euery man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the same artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a few, is no perfect argument of the common conceiuing of witte, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godly and vngodly, it is rightfully reckened among naturall giftes.

15 So oft therefore as we light vpon prophane writers, let vs be put in minde by that maruellous light of truth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, how much fouer it be peruerted and fallen from the first integritie, is yet still clothed and garnished with excellent giftes of God. If we consider that the spirite of God is the onely fountaine of truth, we will neither refuse nor despise the truth it selfe, wherelocuer it shall appeare, except we will dishonorably vse the spirite of God: for the giftes of the holy Ghost cannot be set light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe; And what? shall we denie that the truth shined to the olde Lawyers, which haue set forth Ciuill order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall we say that they had no witte, which by setting in order the arte of speech, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which in setting forth Philosophie, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall we thinke them dotting errours of madde men? no, rather we cannot reade the writings of the olde men, concerning these things, without great admiration of their witte. But shall wee thinke any thing praise worthie or excellent, which we doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs be ashamed of so great vnthankfulness into which the heathen Poets fell nor, which confus'd that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good Artes, were the inuentions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whom the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searching out of inferiour things, let vs learne by such examples, how many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath bene spoyled of the true God.

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good gifts of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankind he dealeth abroad to whom it pleaseth him. For if it behooued, that the vnderstanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, should be powred into Beseleel and Oliab by the spirite of God, it is no marvell if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be said to be communicated vnto vs by the spirite of God. Neither is there cause why any man should aske, what haue the wicked to doe with Gods spirite, which are altogether estranged from God.

and find out error: in breuen non vniuersaliter standung die liberalitate of God/ in nob: without which all would be as some are euen more naturals.

The skill which Philosophers had in sundry arts and sciences, sheweth what good God hath left to the nature of man: which is withall, although he hath robbed and stripped himselfe of the clearest giftes wherewith God endued him.

The knowledge of artes and sciences is the gift of the spirite of God: whether it is to be neglected although before God it be but a vanishing transitory thing Exod. 31.2. & 35. 30.

Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of

For where it is said that the spirite of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely : that is to be vnderstanded of the spirite of sanctification, by the which we are consecrate to God himselfe, to be his temples : yet doth he neuertheless fill, moue and quicken all things with the vertue of the same spirite, and that according to the proprietie of euerie kinde which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue been the Lords will that we should be holpen by the trauell and seruice of the wicked in naturall Philosophy, Dialectike, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other : let vs vie it, least if we neglect the giftes of God, willingly offered in them, we suffer iust punishment for our slothfulnessse. But lest any should thinke a man to be blessed, when vnder the elements of this world there is graunted vnto him so great an abilitie to conceiue truth, it is also to be added that all this power to vnderstand, and the vnderstanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where is not a stedfast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truely, whom (as we haue said) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Schoolemen are compelled to assent vnto, as the free giftes were taken from man after his fall, to these naturall giftes which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselues in asmuch as they come from God, but because they cease to be pure to a defiled man; that he should haue no praise of them.

Lib. 2. dist. 25.

As God hath in common indued men with reason,
so he doth particularly for speciall purposes power speciall motions into them.

17 Let this be the summe : that it is seene that in all mankinde is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beastes, as brute beastes doe differ in sence from things without life. For whereas there bee borne certaine naturall fooles and idiots, that default obscureth not the generall grace of God : but rather by such sight we are put in minde, that what is left vnto our selues, ought iustly to be ascribed to the kindenesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpnesse of conceiuing, some other doe passe in iudgement, some haue a quicker wit to learne this or that arte : in this varietie God setteth forth his grace vnto vs, that no man should claime to himselfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becommeth one more excellent than another, but that in common nature might appeare about other the speciall grace of God, which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bound to none. Beside that, God powreth in singular motions, according to the calling of euerie man. Of which thing we meete with many examples in the bookes of the Iudges, where it is said, that the spirite of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose harts the Lorde had touched. And when his ministering in the kingdome was prophesied of, Samuel said thus : The spirite of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be another man. And this was continued to the whole course of government : as after it is spoken of Dauid, that the spirite of the Lorde came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions : yea, in Homer men are said to excell in witte, not onely as Iupiter hath dealt to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amazed as were most sharpe and deepe witted, that the wittes of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at euery moment : for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some markes of the Image of God, which doe make difference betweene all mankinde and other creatures.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdome of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things : to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, wherein our saluation standeth : and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than moles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosphers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken, but yet such as doe alway fauour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gaue them in deede, as is aboue said, a little taste of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodlineffe: and many times he moued them to speake many things, by confession whereof themselves might be conuincid: But they so saue the things that they saue, that by such seeing they were not directed to the truth, much lesse did attain vnto it, like as a way-faring man in the middle of the field, for a sudden moment, seeth farre and wide the glittering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that he is sooner couered againe with the darknesse of the night, than he can sture his foote, so farre is it off that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small drops of truth, wherewith as it were by chaunce, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good wil toward vs, without which mans wit must needes be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approacheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to vnderstand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

son conceiues very little in the first, thing at all.*

19 But because we being drunke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, doe very hardly suffer our senses to be persuaded, that in matters of God it is vterly blinde and dull: I thinke it shall be better to confirme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doeth Isa very well teach in that place which I euen now alleaged, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darknesse, and the darknesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deede, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparkle of it, but yet, that with such a light hee comprehendeth not God. And why so? because mans quicknesse of wit, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darknesse. For when the holy ghost calleth men darknes, he at once spotteth them of all abilitie of spirituall vnderstanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloud, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say: flesh is not capable of so high wisdom to conceiue God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall reuelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

Mat. 16. 7.

20 If we were persuaded of this which ought to be out of all controuersie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heavenly father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then heere were no matter to doubt vpon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing when he saith, that no man can call Iesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, that no man can receiue any thing, vnlesse it be giuen him from aboue. And that he meaneth by gift a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appereth heereby, that he complaineth that in so manie wordes as he had spoken to commend Christ to his disciples, he preuailed nothing. I see (saith he) that wordes are nothing to informe mens mindes concerning diuine things, vnlesse the Lord giue vnderstanding by his spirit. Yea, and Moses, when hee reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefit of God. Thine eyes (saith he) haue scene those great tokens and woonders, and, The Lord hath not giuen thee a hart to vnderstande, nor eares to heare, nor eyes to see. What shoulde hee expresse more, if hee called vs blockes in considering the workes of God?

The word of God can neuer enlighten men without his grace.
Eph. 1. 15.

21 And ſo that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he giueth it to God alone. God (ſaith he) and the father of glorie, giue to you the ſpirit of wiſedome and reuelation. Now thou heareſt that all wiſedome and reuelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your mind. Surely if they need a new reuelation, then are they blind of themſelues. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling, &c. Therefore he confeſſeth, that the wits of men are not capable of ſo great vnderſtanding, to know their owne calling. And let not ſome Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedie that dulnes or vnliſtfulneſſe, when by the doctrine of his worde he directeth mans vnderſtanding, whether without a guide he could not haue attained. For Dauid had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wiſedome that may be deſired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to haue his eyes opened that he may conſider the myſteries mysteries of the same law. By which speech truly he secretly saith, that the Sunne riseth vpon the earth where the word of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntill he himselfe, that is therefore called the father of lightes, doe giue them or open their eyes, because where soeuer he shineth not with his spirite, all things are possessed with darkenes. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best schoolemaster: yet if they had not needed the spirit of truth to instruct their minds in that same doctrine which they had heard before, he would not haue bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we doe thereby confesse that wee want: and God in that that he promiseth it vs, doth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to vnderstand the mysteries of God as hee is enlightened with his grace. He that giueth to himselfe more vnderstanding, is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindness.

22 Now remaineth the third point, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which we doe rightly call the knowledge of the workes of righteousness, wherein mans wit seemeth to be of somewhat more sharpe sight, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the Gentiles which haue no law, while they doe the workes of the law, are to themselves in steede of a Law, and doe shew the Law written in their harts, their consciences bearing them witnes, and their thoughtes accusing them within themselves or excusing them before the iudgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteousness naturally grauen in their mindes, surely wee cannot say that we are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the Law naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the law is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, how farre it bringeth them toward the marke of reason and truth. The same is also euident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. He had saide a litle before, that they which sinned in the Law, are iudged by the Law, they which haue sinned without Law doe perish without Law. Because this might seeme vnreasonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any iudgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in steede of a Law, and therefore is sufficient for their iust damnation. Therefore the end of the Law naturall is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shall be defined not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently discerneth betweene iust and vniust, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proued guiltie by their owne testimonie. Such is the tendernes of man toward himselfe, that in doing of euils, he alway turneth away his mind so much as hee may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was moued to thinke that there is no sinne done but by ignorance. That indeede were fitly said of him, if mens hypocrisie went so farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it selfe guiltie before God. But when the sinner seeking to eschue the iudgement imprinted in him, is now and then drawne backe vnto it, and not suffered so to winke, but that he be compelled whether he will or no, sometime to open his eyes: it is falsely said that he sinneth onely by ignorance.

23 Themistius saith more truly, which teacheth that vnderstanding is seldom decieued in the generall defining of things, that it is blindness when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the speciall case. Every man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manslaughter is euill: but he that conspireth to kill his enemies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, priuately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignorance, when a man comming to the speciall case forgetteth the rule, that he had largely agreed vpon in the generall question. Of which thing Augustine discourseth very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the lvij. Psalme: albeit the same thing

Iac. 1. 17.

John 14. 26.

There is in man some knowledge of that which serueth for the well framing of his life: namely a certaine conscience of good and euill.
Rom. 2. 14.

In Protagora.

The minde which knoweth generally that euill must be shunned, is notwithstanding blinde in discerning particularly what it should thin as euill, and carried sometimes wanting to euill, because that euill which it knoweth.
Paraph. in lib. 3. de anima. cap. 46.

is not continuall. For sometime the shamefulness of the euill deede so presseth the conscience, that not deceiuing himselfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly and willingly he runneth into euill. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better and allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, mye thinke, Aristotle hath verie aptly made distinction between Incontinence and intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he saith, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euill in his owne act, which it generally seeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceined choise of euill.

24. Now when thou hearest iudgement vniuersally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not euery sound and perfect iudgement. For if mens hearts are furnished with choise of iust and vniust, onely to this ende, that they should not pretende ignorance, it is not then needefull to see the truth in euery thing. But it is enough and more, that they vnderstand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being conuict by witness of their conscience, they euen now alreadie begin to tremble at the iudgement seat of God. And if we will trie our reason by the law of God, which is the examplar of true righteousnesse, we shall finde how many waies it is blinde. Truly it attaineth not at all to those that are the chief things in the First table, as of confidence in God, of giuing to him the praise of strength and righteousnesse, of calling vpon his name, of the true keeping of Sabbath. What soule euer by naturall sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these and like things? For when prophane men will worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway slide backe thither againe. They denie in deede that sacrifices do please God, vnlesse there be adioyned a purenesse of minde: wherby they declare, that they conceiue somewhat of the spirituall worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false inuentions. For it can neuer be perswaded them, that all is true that the lawe prescribeth of it. Shall I say, that that wit excelleth in any sharp vnderstanding, which can neither of itselfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commandements of the Second table it hath some more vnderstanding, by so much as they came nerer to the preferuention of ciuill fellowship among men. Albeit euen herein also it is found many times to faile. To euery excellent nature it seemeth most vnreasonable, to suffer an vniust, and too imperious a manner of gouerning ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the iudgement of mans reason is none other, but that it is the part of a seruile and base courage, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the part of an honest and free borne hart, to shake it off. And reuenge of iniuries is reckened for no fault among the Philosophers. But the Lord condemning that too much noblenesse of courage, commandeth his to keepe the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our vnderstanding marketh not concupiscence at all. For a naturall man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choaked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of minde for faultes, they meane those motions that appeare and shewe fourth themselves by grosse tokens; but they make no account of those euill desires that doe gently tickle the minde.

25. Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all finnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be reiected, which teach that purposed malice and forwardnesse is vsed in all finnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is overwhelmed with so many sortes of being deceued, is subiect to so many errors, stumbleth at so many staies, is entangled with so many straites, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lorde in all parts of our life, Paul theweth when hee saith, that we are not sufficient to thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues. He speaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that wee should not thinke that it can come in our mindes how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, vnderstanding and heede so corrupted, that it can deuiſe or thinke vpon nothing that is right before the Lorde? that seemeth too hard to vs, that do vnwillingly suffer our selues to be spoiled of the sharpnesse of reason, which wee account a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that all the inuention of mans hart is onely cuill. If all that our wit conceiueh, deuiseh vpon, purposeh & goeth about, is alway cuill, howe can it come in our mindes to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whom onely holines and righteousness is acceptable? So is it to be seene, that the reason of our minde, which waie soeuer it turne it selfe, is miserable subiect to vanitie. Dauid knewe this weakenesse in himselfe, when he praied to haue vnderstanding giuen him, to learne the Lords commandements aright. For he secretlie saith therein, that his own wit sufficeth him not, which desireth to haue a newe giuen him. And that not onely once, but almost ten times, in one Psalm, he repeateth the same praier. By which repeating he priuily declarcth, with how great need he is driuen to praie it. And that which he prayeth for himselfe alone: Paul commonly vseth to praie for the Churches. Wee cease not (saith he) to praie for you, and to desire that yee may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisdom and spirituall vnderstanding, that yee may walke woorthily of God, &c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that he doth withall testifie, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledged this default of reason to vnderstand those things that are of God, that hee thinketh the grace of illumination to bee no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eies. And not content with that, hee addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lift vp our eies to see the light: but the eies of our minde he shut, vnlesse the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterwarde see by themselves: for that which I euen now alleaged out of Paul, belongeth to continuall proceedings & encreasings. And this doth Dauid expressly set out in these words: With my whole hart haue I sought thee, make me not to strae from thy commandements. For when he had bene regenerated, and had not slenderly profited in true godlines, yet he confesseth, that for every moment he needeth continuall direction, least he should swaue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in another place he praieh to haue the right spirit renewed, which he had lost by his owne fault, because it belongeth to the same God to restore vnto vs the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

26 Nowe is will to be examined, wherein standeth the chiefe libertie of free choise, for it hath bene already seene, that choise doth rather belong to will, than to vnderstanding. First, that this thing, which the Philosophers haue taught, and is received with common consent, that is, that all things by naturall instinct desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to the vprightnes of mans will: Let vs make that the force of free wil, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather proceedeth of the inclination of the essence, than of the aduisement of the vnderstanding mind. For euen the schoolemen doe confesse, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selfe to objects, whereby they meane that the object of appetite must be such as may be subiect to choise, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truly if a man consider what is the naturall desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beastes. For they also desire usually in euerie diuine and heavenly thing which we haue to learne.

Touching the will of man, the generall inclination which it hath to that good whereof Philosophers do so much talke, p. 109. ueth not any freedom or libertie of desiring and esteeming it to be true without the motion of the helle Ghost.

to be well, and when any shewe of good appeereth that moueth their sense, they follow it. But man doth neither chose by reason, that he may followe with diligence that thing which is indeed good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortal nature, nor taketh reason to counsell, nor bendeth his minde, but without reason, without counsell, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, if a man by sense of nature be carried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discerne good by right reason, and when he hath knowne it, that he chuse it, & when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But least any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophistical argument. For appetite is not here called the proper manner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or iustice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do neuer so much desire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternall blessednes is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspieth vnto it, but by the moouing of the holie Ghoss. Wherefore sith the naturall desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to prooue the freedome of will, no more than in mettals and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other things, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euill: or whether it keepeth still anie parcell vnhurt, from whence do growe good desires.

It is not sufficient to confesse that grace maketh the desires of our will effectiual, which otherwise would not be able to attaine any good thing which is wished for: but we must acknowledge that it is the grace of the holie ghost which worketh in vs the verie first beginning to think of wishing well.
Rom. 7. 15.
Gal. 5. 17.

27 They that doe attribute to the first grace of God, that wee will effectually, seeme on the other side to saie secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weak, that it cannot grow to a perfect affection, or raise vp any endeavor. And there is no doubt that the schoulemen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the old writers: forasmuch as they are wont to consider man in pure naturall things, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these wordes: I do not the good that I would, but the euill that I woulde nor, that I doe. To will is present vnto mee, but to performe it I find not. But after this manner is the discourse that Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully peruerted. For he enuereath of the Christian wrastling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithfull continually feele within themselues, in the battell betwene the flesh and the spirite. But the spirite is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeereth by this, that when he had said, that there dwelleth no goodnes in him, he addeth an exposition, that he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore hee saith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, my flesh? Euen as much as if he had saide thus: God dwelleth not in me of my selfe, for there is no good to bee founde in my flesh. Hereupon followeth that maner of excuse: I my selfe do not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the chiefe part of their soule tende vnto good. Now, the conclusion that is adioyned after, declarerth all this matter evidently. I am delited (saith he) with the law, according to the inward man: But I see another lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a striuing in himselfe, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God, carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, where as once he had thought, that that had bene spoken of the nature of man, renoked his exposition as false, and ill agreeing together. And truly, if we allow this, that men without grace haue some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we answer to the Apostle which saith, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall wee answer to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that euerie inuention of mans hart is onely euill? Wherefore sith they haue stumbled by false taking of one place, there is no cause why wee shoulde stay stay vpon their iudgement. Let rather this saying of Christ preuaile. He that doth sinne is the seruant of sinne. We are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all holden vnder the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole man be subiect to the dominion of sinne, then must it needes bee, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, bee bounde fast with most strait bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paul would not stand together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did goe before the grace of the Holy Ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triflingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull doe pray to haue their hart formed to the obedience of the lawe, as Dauid doth in many places : yet it is to be noted, that euen that desire of praying is from God. Which we may gather of his wordes, for when he wisheth to haue a cleane hart created within him, surely hee taketh not on himselfe the beginning of creation. Therefore, let rather this saying of Augustine haue place with vs : God will preuent thee in all things : And sometime preuent thou his wrath. How ? Confesse that thou hast all these things of God, that whatsoever good thou hast, is of him : whatsoever euill, it is of thy selfe. And a little after : Nothing is ours but sinne.

*De verbis Apostoli

The iij. Chapter.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.

BUT man cannot be any way better knowne in either part of his soule, than if hee come forth with his tiules wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If he be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to proue, then is he proued to bee a very miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimitie against God, and so is not subiect, nor can be subiect to the lawe of God. Is flesh so peruerse, that with all her affection shee continually vseth enimitie against God? that she cannot agree with the rightcoulnesse of the lawe of God? Finally, that she can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Now, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. Hee commandeth not to be borne againe according to the bodie. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be amended, but when it is all reuiewed. And that doth the comparison, set in both places, confirme. For the spirite is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we haue nothing of the Spirite but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoever we haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we could haue any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paul, where after he had described the olde man, whome he had saide to be corrupt with concupiscences of error, hee biddeth vs to bee reuiewed in the spirite of our minde : you see he doth not place vnlawfull and euill lustes onely in the sensitiue part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a reuiewing of it. And truly a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shew that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruerued: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in vnderstanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindness of their hart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whome the Lord hath not reformed to the vprightnesse both of his wisdom and iustice: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned,

adoyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these wordes we gather, that the grace of Christ, is the onely remedie whereby we be deliuered from that blindness, and the euils that ensue thereof. For so had Esay also prophesied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, that the Lord should be an euerlasting light to his Church, when yet darknesse couered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truly without the Church he leaueth nothing but darknesse and blindness. I will not rehearse particularly such things as are written euery where, specially in the Psalmes and in the Prophets against the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that Dauid writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall bee vainer than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a greuous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifling, madde and peruerse.

2 No easier is the condemnation of the hart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse aboue all things: but because I studie to be short, I will be content with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein wee may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throwe downe the arrogancie of mankinde, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that vnderstandeth or that seeth God, All are gone out of the way, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throte is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poyson of Serpents is vnder their lips, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: whose teete are swift to svedde blood, in whose waies is sorrow and vnhappinesse, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes. With these thunderboltes hee inueyeth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sonnes of Adam. Neither declaimeth he against the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to teach rather that all men are oppressed with calamitie, impossible to bee ouercome, from which they cannot get vp againe, vnlesse they bee plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not be prooued vnlesse it had bene by the ouerthrowe and destruction of nature, hee brought forth these testimonies whereby is prooued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they be here described, not onely by fault of euill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument cannot stande, that there is no saluation for man but by the mercie of God, because he is in himselfe vtterly lost and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in proouing the applying of these testimonies that no man should thinke them vnjustly vsed. I will to take them as if they had bene first spoken by Pawl, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man rightcoulnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then vnderstanding. The want of vnderstanding, he prooueth by Apostasie or departing from God, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisdom. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. He saith further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doeth good, and then hee adioyneth the haynous fautes, wherewith they defile their members that are once let loose into wickednesse. Last of all he testifieth that they are voide of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should haue bene directed. If these be the inheritable gifts of mankinde, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I grant that not all these fautes doe appeere in euery man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the harts of all men. For as the body while it already fostreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot be called healthie: no more can the soule be reckoned sound, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all pointes. For in the body be it neuer so much diseased, there remaineth a quicknes of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulfe of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath bene before assoyled, now riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there have been some, which by guiding of nature have bene bent to vertue in all their life. And I regard it not, though many slippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the verie studie of honestie they haue shewed a prooffe, that there was some purenesse in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we shal speak of the merits of works, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so far as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that we should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her instruction som men haue not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselues most honestly. But here we must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restrain it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with loose reins to runne wildlie into all sorts of lustes, without doubt there woulde be no man, but he woulde in plaine experience make vs belecue, that all those euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truly faide of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose secte are swift to shed bloud, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throates like vnto open sepulchres, their tonges deceitful, their lips veneneous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruerfenesse, whose eies are bent to entrappings, their hearts lift vp despiteouslie to triumph ouer other, and all the parts of them applied to infinite mischiefes. If euerie soule bee subiect to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldlie pronounceth, truly we see what woulde come to passe, if the Lorde woulde suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beast that is so headlong carried away, there is no streame bee it neuer so swifte and strong, wherof the ouerflowing is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that wee will by and by set forth. In some he onelie restraineth them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so faure as he foreseeeth to be expedient for preferuing of the vniuersitie of things. Heereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vncleannesse. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sort aspire towarde it. Some rise vp about the common sort, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their dutie. So God by his prouidence bridlethe the peruerfenesse of nature, that it breake not forth into dooings, but he clenseth it not within.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolued. For either we must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or else in Camillus we shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I graunt indeede that those goodlie gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme woorthie to be commended, if they be weyed by themselues, but how shall they be prooues of naturall goodnesse in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sort? If a naturall man excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power towarde the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and following anie thing rather than vpright strenghtnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that

The morall honestie of prophane men is no argument of purenesse in nature, because is commeth not of them but of the grace of God working in them: not the grace that regenerate the hart, but that bridlethe onely and restraineth the peruerfnesse of naturall inclination.

Rom. 3. 10.

The vertues of goodly men do neither come of naturall goodnesse and by naturall corruption: they are so polluted, that in the sight of God they are lost-lose.

that

that he was a naturall man. Now what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto me in this behalfe, if in the greatest shew of purenesse it be founde that he is alway carried to corruption? Therefore, least yee commend a man for vertue, whose vices deceiue you vnder vertues Image, do not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne peruerfinesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common gifts of nature, but speciall graces of God, which he diuerslie and to a certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vngodlie. For which reason wee feare not in common speech to call one man well natured, and another of euill nature, and yet we cease not to include them both vnder the vniuersall state of mans corruption, but we shewe what speciall grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which he hath not vouchsafed to giue to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him as a newe man. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, saith that Kings sonnes are created notable by some singular maik, because God prouiding for mankinde, furnisheth these with a princely nature whom he appointeth to beare government: & out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renowned in histories. The same is also to be thought of priuate men. But because as euery man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moued him forwarde (with which spot all vertues are defiled; so that they loose all fauour before God) it is to be accounted nothing woorth, whatsoeuer seemeth praise woorthie in vngodly men, beside that the chiefe part of vprightnesse faileth, where there is no studie to aduance the glorie of God, which all they want whom hee hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vaine-lic spoken in Esaie, that vpon Christ resteth the spirite of the feare of God, whereby we are taught, that so manie as are strange from Christ are without the feare of God, which is the beginning of wisdome. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine shewe, I grant they shall haue praise in the court of pollicie, and in the common fame of men, but before the heauenly iudgement seate, they shall be of no value to deserue righteousnes.

Essay 11. 3.

The will of man being corrupt, is of necessitie yet without compulsion inclined vnto sinne.

Ierc. 31. 18.

§ With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is detained, it cannot once moue it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse applye it selfe. For such mouing is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremie praith to the Lord to turne him, if he will haue him turned. Whereupon the prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spirituall redemption of the faithfull people, saith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with how strait fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Diuell. Yet Will still remaineth, which with most bent affection is both inclined and hasteth to sinne. For man was not deuiued of Will when he did cast himselfe into this necessitie, but of the soundnesse of Will. And Bernard saith not vntruly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simpliciter to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill of corrupt nature: to Will well of grace. Nowe, whereas I saie, that Will put from libertie is by necessitie drawne or led into euill, it is maruell if that should seem a hard speech vnto any man, which neither hath any absurditie in it, nor varieth from the vse of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene necessitie and compulsion. But if a man aske them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the diuell of necessitie euill? what can they answer? For so is goodnes knit with Gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessarie than he be God than that he be good. And the diuell is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnes, that he can do nothing but euill. But now if any robber of God doe barke against this and saie, that God deserueth small praise for his goodnesse, which he is compelled to keepe: shall not this bee a readie answer to him, that it commeth to passe by his infinite infinite goodnesse and not by violent impulsioe, that he cannot doe euill. Therefore if this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the diuell which cannot doe but euill yet willingly sinneth, who shall then say that a man doth therefore lesse willingly sinne for this that he is subiect to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine each where speaketh of it, euen then also when he was enuiously pressed with the cauillation of Celestinus, he stuck not to affirme in these wordes, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but now the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as he falleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kept, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth in deed willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by forraine constraint: but yet of such peruersnesse of nature as he is, he cannot but be moued and driuen to euill. If this be true, then surely it is plainly expressed that hee is subiect to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine writeth thus, onely man among all liuing creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, he also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that euen thereby also he shoulde not be deprived of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a litle after, will being changed in it selfe into worse, by I worne what corrupt and maruellous manner, so maketh necessitie that very necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, and will for as much as it is drawne by alluremeent, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine manner willing. Afterward he saith that we are pressed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will we are inexcusable, because will when it was free, made it selfe the bondseruant of sinne. At length he concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine maruellous and euill manner holden both a bondseruant and free, vnder this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bondseruant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more marvellous and more miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truly the readers doe perceiue that I bring no new thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the consent of all godly men, and almost a thousand yeres after was kept still in monkes Cloysters, but Lombard when he could not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gaue matter to a pernicious error.

Sermon super Cant. 81.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what maner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For whereas the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which we want, when we shall knowe what his worke is in vs, it will straigh way appeere on the other side what is our neede. When the Apostle saith to the Philippians, that hee trusteth that he which began a good worke in them, will performe it vnto the day of Iesus Christ: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, hee meaneth the verie beginning of conuersion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stirring vp in our hearts the loue, desire and endeouour of righteousnesse, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our hearts to righteousnesse: he endeth it in confirming vs to perseuerance. And that no man shoulde caull that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of it selfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghost in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it selfe. I will giue you (saith he) a new hart. I will put a new spirit in the middes of you. And I will take away the stonie hart from your flesh, and I will giue you a hart of flesh. And I will put my spirit in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commandements. Who shall say that the weakenesse of mans will is strengthened

God is the onely framer of the will vnto good things, from the first motion to the last perfection of euery good act, his hande worketh and worketh alone.

Cap. 3. Of the knowledge of

strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aspire to the choise of that that is good, when it must be wholie transformed and renewed? If there be any softnesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed euery way, then will I graunt that the hart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, be supplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to shew by this similitude, that no goodnesse could euer be woong out of our hart vnlesse it be made throughly new: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which he challengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into flesh, when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I say that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the conuersion of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an euill will into a good. And this I affirme to be wholly done by God, because we are not able so much as to thinke, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in another place he saith, that God doth not onely helpe our weak will, or amende our peruerse will, but that he worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is easily gathered, that which I saide before, that whatsoeuer good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace. In which sense in another place he saith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there intreate of the vniuersall gouernement, but giueth vnto God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in saying, all, truly he maketh God the author of spirituall life, euen from the beginning to the ende. Which selfe same thing he had taught before in other words, saying that the faithfull are of God in Christ, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is destroyed. For there is to be vnderstanded a comparison betweene Adam and Christ, which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he teacheth that we are the worke of God created in Christ to good works, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to prooue, that our saluation is of free gift, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the second creation, which we obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our selues, were it neuer so small, we should haue also some portion of merite. But he to prooue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we haue deserued nothing, because we are create in Christ to good works, which God liath prepared. In which words he signifieth againe, that all partes of good works euen from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had said in the Psalm that we are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, We made not our selues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spirituall life, appeereth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now how he not contented simply to haue giuen to God the praite of our saluation, doth expressly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if he would say, that there resteth no peece, be it neuer so litle, for man to glorie in, because it is all of God.

7 But there be some peraduenture that will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is conuerted by the onely power of the Lord: but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before euery good worke, but so, that will doth accompanie it and not leade it, as a waiting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth disorderly writhe to this purpose, But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signified, that the Lorde doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is preuented by grace, in that respect I giue you leau to call it a waiting maide : but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lord, that is wrongfully giuen to man that he doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrystome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke verie well it selfe, as euen now we haue seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the waiting maide of grace, to assigne vnto her a certaine second office in dooing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principall cause of saluation in mans deseruing: therefore he stood onely vpon this point, that grace was before all deseruing: which was sufficient for the matter that he then had in hande, not meddling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handled. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doth preuent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, he maketh him altogether the whole author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguing vpon them. Men (saith hee) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expound that saying of Christ, Euery one that hath heard of my father commeth to mee, he saith: Free will is so holpen not onely that it may know what is to be done, but also may do it when it hath knowen it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by the grace of the spirit, he so teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not only see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

8 And because we are now in hande with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs go forward and prooue the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, least any man should accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let vs shew that the truth which we affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimonie of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shall be brought forth, the way may be prepared to vnderstand all the rest that are heere and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shall not be vnwisely done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthily the consent of godly men doth much esteeme. Surely, it is euident by plaine and certaine prooffe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there cannot be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also another reason not vnlke vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be seene whence faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when we, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lord, when he nameth these two things in the conuersion of his people, to take away from them a stonie hart, and to giue them a hart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must be done away, that we may be conuerted to righteousness: and that whatlocuer commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he vttereth not this in one place onely. For he saith in Jeremie: I will giue them one hart and one way, that they may feare me all their daies. And a little after, I will giue the feare of my name into their hart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechial: I will giue them one hart, and I will giue a new spirit in their bowels. I will take away the stony hart out of their flesh, and I will giue them a heart of flesh. Hee could not more euidently claime to himselfe, and take from vs whatsoeuer is good and right in our will, then when he declareth that our conuersion is a creation of a new spirit, and of a newe hart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

The prayers of holy men to haue their harts giuened vnto good things: the religionie of Christ that without him we are like wilde beasts & dry sheeps: of Paul & David asking both the first and last in our wills to God as the author, prouide sufficiently that our liking, desiring, following, and using good, our going forward, and continuing in it, is of him.

Pla. 51. 12.

Iohn. 15. 1.

Mat. 15. 13.

9 And so read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde incline our hart to him (saith Salomon) that we may keepe his commandments. He sheweth the sowarnesse of our heart which naturally reioyeth to rebell against the L. v. of God if it be not bowed. And the same thing is in the Psalme: Lord incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the peruerse motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obstinacie, and this correction whereby it is lead to obedience. When David feeling himselfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new hart within him, to renew a right spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the parts of his heart are full of vncleannesse, and his spirit writhen with crooked peruerfittie? and in calling the cleannesse which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doth hee not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the verie prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our answer is readie, that though David were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doeth he still compare his first state with that sorrowfull fall that hee had felt. Therefore taking vpon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause prayeth to haue giuen him all these things that God giueth to his elect in regeneration. And so being like a dead man, he wnketh himselfe to be created of new, that of the bondslawe of Satan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Marvellous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If sluggishnesse hindreth not, Christ hath giuen testimonie euident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuiously suppressed. I am (saith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruit of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in me. For without me you can doe nothing. If we beare fruit none otherwise than a branch buddeth being plucked out of the ground and without moisture: we neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can do nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our felues: but in bringing vs to nothing, hee excludeth all opinion of power be it neuer so little. If we being grafted in Christ, beare fruit like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of liuelines both from the moisture of the earth, and from the dew of heauen, and from the cherishing of the sun: I see nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if we keepe whole for God that which is his. The fonde furdle deuse is alleaged in vaine, that there is iuice alreadie enclosed within the braunche, and a certaine power to bring forth fruit, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first iuice, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christ doth meane nothing elsie, but that wee are a drie stick and nothing woorth, when we be seuered from him, because by our felues being separate, we haue no power to do well: as also in another place he saith: Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted shal be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle askeith all the whole vnto him in the place alreadie alleaged. It is God (saith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe. The first part part of a good worke is will : the second is a strong indeuour in doing it : the Author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from God, if we take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectually working. If it were saide that God doth helpe our weak will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is saide that he maketh our will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And bicause the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it cannot rise vp : He said further, that to ouercome the hardnesse of that battell, there is ministred vnto vs stedfastnesse of endeuour, euen to the elect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein we haue before taught that the whole courte of spirituall life is comprehended For which reason, Dauid, after he had prayed to haue the waies of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walke in his truth, by and by addeth : Vnite thou my harte to feare thy name. In which words he significth, that euen they that are well minded, are subiect to so many withdrawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had prayed to haue his steppes directed to keepe the word of God, he requirerth also to haue strength giuen him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (saith he) beare rule ouer me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin and ende a good worke in vs : that it may all be his worke, that will conceiue a loue of that which is right, that it is inclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp and moued to endeuour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeuour faint not, but doe proceede euen to the effect : last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

10 And he moueth the will, not in such sort as hath in many ages been taught and beleued : that it is afterward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthening it. Therefore that must bee reiected which Chrysostome so oft repeareth : whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he licerly teacheth that God doth only reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his aide. We grant that such was the state of man while he yet stooode, that he might bow to either part. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, yntil God both will and can in vs : what shall become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather we doe obscure and extenuate it with our vnthankfulnesse. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good will is offered vs, if we doe accept it, but that he will performe it in vs : which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his spirit doth direct, bow and gouerne our hart, and reigne in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he will giue to the elect a new spirit onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commandements, but to make them walke in deed. Neither can Christes saying, (Euery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuall of it selfe : as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchsafeth not to giue to all men generally without regarde, as that saying (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what lieth in him. Men are in deede to be taught that Gods goodnesse is laid open for all men, without exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely beginne to seeke for it, whom the heavenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as the little peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truly this is the prerogative of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirit of God, they are moued and gouerned by his guiding. Therefore Augustine doth worthylye as well mocke them, that claime any parte of willing to themselves, as hee doth reprehende other which thinke, that that is generally giuen to all men, which is the speciall testimony of free election. Nature (saith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a bricke subtletie of witte like glasse, that God doth not onely make our will the offer to incline it, which if we accept it worketh and not otherwise, but he seereth good before vs, giueth vs eyes to see it and effectuallly boweth our minds vnto it.

glistreth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whome it pleaseth him. And in another place: How canst thou? by beleeking. Feare thou, least while thou takest vpon thee that thou hast found the iust way, thou perishest out of the iust way, I came (saicst thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Heare euen him that calleth: No man commeth to me vnlesse my Father drawe him. And it is without controuersie gathered out of Iohns words, that the hartes of the godly are so effectually governed by Gods working, that they follow with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (saith he) can not sinne, because the seede of God abideth in him. For wee see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which we at our libertie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectually constancie to continue is affirmed.

11 Of continuance there should no more doubt haue beene made, but that it should haue beene taken for the free gift of God vnlesse the most wicked error had growen in force, that it is distributed according to the desert of men, as euery man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankfull to the first grace. But forasmuch as this error hath growen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receiue the grace of God offered, that opinion being driuen away, this other doth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they erre two manner of waies. For beside this that they teach that our thankfulness towarde the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof are rewarded with the latter giftes: they adde also, that now grace alone doth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the first this we ought to beleue, that the Lord while he dayly enricheth and heapeth his seruants with new giftes of his grace, because he liketh and fauoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestowe greater graces. And hereto serue those sayings, To him that hath, shall be giuen. Againe: Oh, good seruant, because thou hast beene faithfull in few things, I will set thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawfull vse of the first grace be found to be rewarded with the later graces, nor it be so counted a rewarding, that it cease to be reckoned the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this blessing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they haue vsed the first graces, they shall be encreased with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they vse no lesse wrongfully than vnhappily that old definition of working and together working grace. Augustine vsed the same in deede, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth end that which in working he beginneth, and that it is still the same grace but changeth name, according to the diuise maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that hee doth not part it betweene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but onely noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many giftes of God doe goe before the good will of man, among the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leauech nothing that it may claime to it selfe. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had said that it is God, which worketh in vs both to wil and to performe, he by and by addech that he doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnes. Whereas they are wont to say, that after we haue once giuen place to the first grace, our own inducers do now work together with the grace that followeth. To this I answer: if they mean that we, after we haue beene once by the power of the Lord broken to the obedience of righteousness, doe of our owne accord goe forward, and are inclined to follow the working of graces, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certaine, that there is such a readinesse of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence

Iohn. 6. 44.

1. Iohn. 3. 9.

As our first entrance into well-willing, so our continuance therein is also the worke and free gift of God: they erre who hold either that the thankfull use of the first grace doth deserue the second, or that the first only worketh alone, and with the second we our selues are cooperators.

commeth that, but from this, that the spirite of God alway agreeing with it selfe, doth cherish and confirme to stedfastnesse of continuing the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himselfe somewhat wherby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pefulentlie deceued.

12 And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I haue labored more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so, that he calleth himselfe a worker together with grace. It is maruell that so many which otherwise were not euill men, haue stumbled at this strawe. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away all the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (saith he) that haue labored, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfullnesse of the speech deceiued them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greeke article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkely, though shortly, where he thus saith: The good will of man goeth before many giftes of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: His mercy hath preuented me: And his mercie shall follow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him will: and it followeth him willing, that he wil not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking thus: Drawe me in a manner vnwilling, that thou maist make me willing: drawe me lying slothfull, that thou maist make me runne.

13 Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne words, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, should as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whose long agoe Augustine was drawn soorth into the same contention. In his booke of Correpugn and grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet doe it in his owne words: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to overcome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to bee able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And least he should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortallitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after hee plucketh out this doubt. For (saith he) the will of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore will, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weakenesse, in which yet behooueth the power to be made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnto them, that by the helpe of God they may if they will, and God doth not worke in them to will: then among so many temptations will should needs fall downe for weakenes, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weakenesse of mans will, that it should be moued without swauing or securing by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint how weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our harts doe of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he saith, that the Lord doth draw men in deede with their owne wils, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onely offered by God to be received or refused at euery mans Free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election and will in the hart: so that euerie good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his words out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euerie good worke in vs.

S. Augustines doctrine, not that God doth offer his grace which man hath free election to receive or refuse, but that the will and election of euery receiver is by him thorowly framed.

Epi. 107.5.
By grace freely & vnderseuedly giue vnto Gods elect their will is conuerted vnto good and therein strengthened to consume.

Epi. 100.6.

14 But whereas he saith in another place, that wil is not taken away by grace, but from an euill will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: the meane thoughly that man is not so drawn, that without any motion of heart he is carried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his verie hart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: Wee knowe that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whom it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merits of workes, nor according to the merits of will, but of free fauour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the iust iudgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen to the desertings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselves worthie. For he will haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessarie to vs for euene of our doings, and is not giuen in recompense to workes, that it may be grace in deed. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Corpeption and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by libertie, but libertie by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delite printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with inuincible force: that while grace gouerneth, it neuer falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbledowne. That by the free mercie of God it both is conuerted to good, and being conuerted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and stedfastnesse after direction, hangeth vpon the onely will of God, and not vpon any merit of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we list so to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

Epist. 46.

The iij. Chapter.

How God worketh in the hearts of men.

Susan smeth and vnaeth in the will of wicked men, who of themselves are most willing to be stored, led and guided by him.

IT is sufficiently proued, as I thinke, that man is so holden captiue with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor traueil by endeuour to goodnesse: beside that, wee haue rehearsed a distinction betweene compulsion and necessitie, whereby it might appeare, that when he sinneth of necessitie, yet neuertheless hee sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subiect in bondage to the Diuell, he seemeth rather to be lead by the diuels will than his owne, it resteth now to be declared of what sort are both kindes of working. And then is this question to be asswoyed, whether in euill workes there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some working of his. In one place Augustine compareth mans will to a horse, which is readie to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the diuell he compareth to riders. If God (saith he) sit vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperately, spurreth it forward if it be too slow, plucketh it backe if it too quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse and wildnesse of it, tamed the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Diuell haue possessed it, he like a foolish and wanton rider, violent ly carrieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe sleepe places, spurreth it forward to stubbornnesse and fearcenesse: which similitude wee will for this time be contented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is said that the will of naturall man is subiect to the rule of the diuill, to be stirred by him, it is not meant thereby that man as it were striuing against it, and resisting is compelled to obey, as wee compell bondslauers against their will, by reason of being their Lords, to doe our commandments : but that being bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of necessity yeeldeth it selfe obedient to euery leading of him. For whom the Lord vouchsaueh not to rule with his spirite, them by iust iudgement he sendeth away to be moued of Satan. Wherefore the Apostle sayeth, that the God of this world hath blinded the mindes of the vnbelecuers ordained to destruction, that they should not see the light of the Gospell. And in another place : That he worketh in the disobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deedes that follow thereupon, are called the workes of Satan, of which yet the cause is not to be sought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the route of euill, wherein resteth the foundation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is sinne.

2. Cor. 4. 4.

Eph. 2. 2.

2 But farre other is the order of Gods doing in such things. And that the same may appeare more certainly vnto vs : let the hurt done to the holy man Iob by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his heardmen, and like enemies in war, droue away his cattell for booties. Now is their wicked deede plainly seene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, from whom the Historie saith, that all this did proceede. But Iob himselfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, whom he saith to haue taken away from him those things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we refer the selfesame worke to God, as Author, to Sathan as Author, and to man as Author of it, but that we must either excuse Sathan by the company of God, or report God to be the Author of euill? Very easily : if first we looke vpon the end, why it was done, and then the maner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamities to exercise the patience of his seruant : The diuill goeth about to drie him to despair. The Chaldees against right and law, seeke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diuersitie in purposes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the maner of doing there is no lesse diuersitie. The Lord leaueth his seruant to Sathan to be afflicted : and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to execute it, he did leaue and deliuer to him to be driuen to it. Sathan with his venomous stings, pricked forward the mindes of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of themselues to doe that mischiefe : they furiously run to doe wrong, and doe binde and defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly said, that Sathan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdome, that is to say, the kingdome of wickednes. It is also saide that God worketh in them after his manner, because Sathan himselfe, forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandement, turneth himselfe hither and thither to execute his iust iudgements. I speake not here of Gods vniuersall mouing, whereby as all creatures are sustained, so from thence they take their effectfull power of doing any thing. I speake onely of that speciall doing, which appeareth in euery speciall act. We see therefore that it is no absurditie, that one selfe act be ascribed to God, to Sathan, and to man : but the diuersitie in the end and maner of dooing, causeth that therein appeareth the iustice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednes of Sathan and man bewrayeth it selfe to their reproch.

God and Sathan and man working one and the selfesame act, worke diuersly in respect as well of the end as the maner of doing. Iob. 1.

In the euill motions of wicked men God worketh after two sortes, the one by will holding his grace, in hereby they might be moued vnto good, the other by vsing the ministerie of Sathan to stirr. flame and encline their will. Lib. de praedict. & grat.

3 The olde writers in this point also, are sometime precisely afraid, simply to confesse the truth, because they feare lest they should so open a window to wickednes, to speake it reuerently of the workes of God. Which sibieticus as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing dangerous, if we simply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himselfe sometime was not free from the superstition, as where he saith, that hardning and blinding, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his fore knowledge. But the phrascs of Scripture allow not these subtleties, which phrascs doe plainly few that there is therein somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himselfe in his fift booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long proesse to prooue that sins are not onely of the permission or sufferance of God, but also of his power, that so former sinnes might be punished. Likewise, that which they bring fourth, concerning permission, is too weake to stand. It is oftentimes said, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, and mooueth their harts as I haue else where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is neuer expressed, if we flee to free foreknowledge or sufferance. Therefore we answer that it is done after two manners. For first, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkenesse and blindnes: whereas when his spirit is taken away, our harts waxe hard and become stoness: whereas when his direction ceaseth, they are wrested into crookednes, it is well said that he doth blind, harden and bow them from whom he taketh away the power to see, obey & do rightly. The second manner, which commeth neere to the properie of the words, is that for the executing of his iudgements by sathan the minister of his wrath, he both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth vp their wils, and strengtheneth their endeuours. So when Moses recheareth that king Sehon did not giue passage to the people, because God had hardened his spirit, and made his hart obstinate, he by and by adioyneth the end of his purpose: that he might (saith he) giue him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods wil to haue him destroyed, the making of his hart obstinate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4 After the first manner this seemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of truth, and taketh away reason from the Elders. He taketh the hart away from them that are set ouer the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Againe, Lord, why hast thou made vs mad, and hardened our hart, that we should not feare thee? Bicause they iudge rather of what sort God maketh men by forsaking them, than how he performeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharao. I will harden the hart of Pharao, that he do not heare you, and let the people go. Afterward he saith, that he hath made heauy and hardened his hart. Did he harden it, in nor sustayning it? That is true in deed: but he did somewhat more, that he committed his hart to Sathan to be confirmed with obstinacie. Whereupon he had before said: I will hold his hart. The people went out of Ægypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth and met them like enemies. By whom were they stured vp? Truly Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lord that had hardened their harts. And the Prophet reciting the same historie, saith, that he turned their harts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stumbled being left without the counsell of God. For if they be hardened and turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. Moreover so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressors of the people, how did he performe his work in the reprobate? so as a man may see, that the effectualnes of working was in him, and they onely did serue as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to intangle them, and sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed and driuen by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse appoint it after this sort: that in as much as they sin, it is their owne: in as much as in sinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that deuided the darknes as pleaseth him.

5 Now that the ministerie of Sathan is used to prick forward the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his prouidence appointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proued, though it were but by one place only. For it is oftentimes said in Satan, that the euil spirit of the Lord, & an euil spirit from the Lord, did either violently carrie or leaue Saul. To say that this spirite was the holic Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the vncléane spirite is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his commandement and power, being rather his instrument in dooing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added with all, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacy of error and deceiuing is sent by God, that they which haue not obeyed the truth, may beleue lies. But there is alway great difference in one selfesame worke, betwene that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan and the wicked go about. He maketh the euill instruments that he hath vnder his hand, and may turne whether he list to serue his iustice. They, in as much as they are euill, do bring forth in effect the wickednes that they haue conceiued by corruptnesse of nature. The rest of such things as serue for to deliuer the maiestie of God from slander, and to cut off all shifting from the wicked, are already set forth in the Chapter concerning Providence. For in this place my purpose was onely to shew how Satan raigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those dooings, which are neither iust nor faultie of themselves, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirituall life. Some in such things haue graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not strue about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainly to prouee the same thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confesse that they which do hold that they haue no power to rightousnesse, do holde the thing that is principally necessarie to saluation: yet I do thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it cometh in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth therunto: againe, so oft as our wit and minde elchucth that which else would haue hurt vs. And the force of Gods providence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shall foresee to be expedient, but also to make the wils of men to tend therunto. Truly, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, we shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shall gve credit to so many testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in these things also rule the harts of men, they shall compell vs to yeelde our will subiect to the speciall moouing of God. Who did procure the good wils of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lend them all their most precious iewels? They would neuer haue found in their harts to haue so done of their owne accord. Therefore their harts were more subiect to the Lord, than ruled by themselves. And truly if Jacob had not been perswaded that God put into men diuerse affections as pleaseth him, he would not haue saide of his sonne Ioseph, whom he thought to be some Heathen Egyptian: God giuant you to finde mercie before this man. As also the whole Church confisseth in the Psalme, that when it pleased God to haue mercie vpon it, he meekened the harts of the cruell nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that hee prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirite of God did enforce him. Who turned away Achisons minde, from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was woont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to bee perswaded with the yoong mens aduse? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the coming of Israel? Truly, the harlot Rahab confisseth, that it was done by God. Againe, who threwe downe the harts of Israel with dread and fearefulnessse, but hee that in the lawe threatned that he would gve them a fearefull hart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things vniuersally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his providence, euen in outward things doth bowe and turne the wils

Lib. de gratia & libero arb. ad Valent. cap. 20.

The meaning of the question that concerneth the freedom of mans will, is not whether he be of non hindered or not from obteining the things he wisheth for, but whether his iudgement and affection be so addicted vnto euill that hee cannot of himselfe discern or desire that which is good.

of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule ouer the freedom thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the moouing of God, than vpon the freedom of thine owne choise, this daily experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy iudgement and wit oft faileth thee, in things not harde to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present aduise is offered thee: in things great and perillous, thou hast a courage ouercomming all difficultie. And so do I expound that which Salomon saith: That the eare may heare, that the eie may see, the Lorde worketh both. For I take it that he speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hande and boweth whither he will the hart of the king as the streames of waters: true lie vnder the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generahitie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a king, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the wils of other: but if the will of the king be ruled with the hand of God, no more shal our will be exempted from the same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine: The Scripture if it be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good wils of men which he of euill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doth direct to good dooings and to eternal life, but also these wils that preferue the creature of the world, are so in the power of God, that he maketh them to be inclined whither hee will and when he will, either to doe benefits, or to execute punishments, by a iudgement most secret indeed, but the same most righteous.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans wil is not to be weyed by the successe of things, which som vnskillful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they seeme to themselves to prooue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because euen the highest Monarches haue not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of free will, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impediments, perforce and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of iudgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrowness of a tonne, fet full of sharpe prickes, shall no lesse haue free will than Augustus Cesar, gouerning a great part of the worlde with the becke of his countenance.

The v. Chapter.

A confutation of the obiections that are wont to be brought for defence of Free will.

The necessitie of fixing doth not excuse vs when we sinne, both because Adam of his owne accord made himselfe and his subiect therunto, and also for that he which necessarily sinneeth, doth neuertheless sin voluntarily: which answereth their reasons

IT might seeme that we haue saide enough alreadie, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throwe it downe headlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certaine reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heape vp together diuerse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from common reason: afterwarde they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (saie they) Sinne be of necessitie, then ceaseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I denie therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I denie againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be auoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his iudgement by this pretence, because he could none other wise doe: God hath that answer ready which we in another place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaves to sinne, can will nothing but euill. For whence commeth this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but vpon this, that Adam of his owne accorde made himselfe subiect to the tyrannie of the Diuell? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bondes whereof we are holden fast tied, for that the first man fell from his Creator. If all men be iustly holden guiltie of his falling away, let them not thinke themselves excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they haue a most euident cause of their damnation. And this I haue aboue plainly set forth, and I haue giuen an example in the Diuell himselfe, whereby it might appeere, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuertheless willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs so subiect vnto it, that we be the bondslaves of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntarie it straightway leapeth to free: but we haue before prooued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subiect to free election.

2 They further say, that if both vertues and vices proceede not of free choise of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laide vpon man or reward giuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, yet I graunt is in some places vsed by Chrysostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hideth not, and also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God worke in vs: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are iustly laid vpon vs from whom the guiltinesse of sinne proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sin be done by free or bond iudgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially such man is hereby prooued a sinner, for that he is vnder the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of righteousness: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifullnesse, than vpon our owne desertings. How oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneeth not our desertings, but his owne gites: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our desertings, but such as are rendred to the graces already bestowed vpon vs? Wisely in deede they note this, that now there remaineth no place for desertings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we say so far differing from truth, they are much deceiued. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to each for necessitie, that which they thinke so vnlawfull to confesse, as where he saith: What be the merites of any men whatsoever they be? when he commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners. Againe, if that shall be rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be punished: what is done then? God hath not giuen thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estranged from grace, boast of thy desertings. Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selfe, Sinners are thine, but desertings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when reward commeth, he shall crowne his owne gites, and not thy desertings. And in the same meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deserting, but deserting of grace. And a little after hee concludeth, that God with his gites goeth before all desertings, that out of the same he may gather his owne desertings, and doth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to saue. But what neede is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often founde in his writings? But the Ap-poble shall yet better deliuer them from this error, if they heare what beginning he conueyeth the glorie of the Saints : Whom he hath chosen, them he hath called: whom he hath called, them he hath justified : whom he hath justified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? because by the Lordes mercie and not by their owne endeouore they are both chosen and called and iustified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shal no more be any deseruings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (saith he) thou hast receiued all things, why gloriest thou, as if thou hadst not receiued them? Thou seest that for the same cause he taketh all things from free will, to leaue no place for deseruings : but as the bountifullnesse and liberalitie of God is manifolde, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which he bestowed on vs, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

1. Cor. 4. 7.

A third reason arguing that if mans will were not naturally free vnto good & euill, but necessarily subiect to the one or the other, either all men should be good or all men euil. As in truth all men are by nature euill, that some are made good, it is by grace and not through the freedome of their will.
Ho. 22. in Gen. Lib. 2. cap. 4. Rom. 3. 10.

3 Moreouer they bring forth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chrysostome: If this be not the power of our will, to chooseth good or euill, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is he, whatfoeuer he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, when he maketh this argument, that no man should euer depart from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is maruell that so excellent men fell beside themselues. For how chanceth it came not in Chrysostomes minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that all together are peruerse and giuen to wickednesse: but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercie it cometh to passe that all abide not in peruerfenesse. Therefore whereas naturally we are all sick of one disease, they only recover health vpon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by iust iudgement he passeth ouer, pine away in their owne rottennesse till they be consumed. Neither is it of any other cause that some continue to the ende, and some fall in their course begunne. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whome it pleaseth himselfe. If a man aske for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnstedfastnesse, we knowe none other cause but that god sustaineth the one sort strengthened with his power that they perish not, and doth not giue the same strength to the other sort, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

A fourth argument for free will to proue that exhorting & threatening are in vaine except man haue power in himselfe to obey: whereas God himselfe who threatneth & exhorteth men, teacheth them neuer thelesse withall, that an obedient heart is his free gift.

Iohn. 15. 5.

2. Cor. 3. 3.

4 Further they presse vs, saying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hande, that the vse of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine he was compelled to write the booke of Correction and grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this summe: O man, in the commandement learne what thou oughtest to doe: in correction learne that by thine owne fault thou hast it not: in praier learne whence thou maiest receiue that which thou wouldest haue. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirit and Letter, where he teacheth that God measurith not the commandements of his lawe by the strength of man, but when he hath commaunded that which is right, he freely giueth to his elect power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First we are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Now let the other looke how they will get the maiestic in striuing, that match themselues with such aduersaries. Doeth Christ, which testifieth that we can doe nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chastise them, that without him did euill? Doeth hee lesse exhort euery man to apply himselfe to good workes? How seuerly doth Paul inuey against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet he praith for charitie to be giuen to the same men from

from God, He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that will leth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie, and yet he ceaseth not afterwarde to admonish, to exhort, and to rebuke. Why do they not therefore speak to the Lord, that he do not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things, which he himselfe alone can giue, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercie of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lorde had not a verie good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readie to be founde of them that reuerently seeke it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the changing of the minde, Paul declareth, when he writeth, that neither he that planneth is anything, nor he that watereth, but the Lorde that giueth the encrease only, effectually worketh. So we see that Moses severally stablisheth the commandements of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharply call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men do then onely waxe wise, when a hart is giuen them to vnderstande, that it is the proper worke of God to circumsise the harts, and in steede of stonie harts to giue harts of flesh, to write his lawe in the bowels of men: finally in renuing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuell.

Rom. 9. 16.

1. Cor. 3. 7.

5 Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose, if they bee despised of the wicked with an obstinate hart, they shal be for a witness vnto them when they shal come to the iudgement seate of the Lorde, yea and euen now alreadie they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoeuer the most srowarde man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disprooue them: but thou wilt saie, what may sicke miserable man do, if the softnesse of hart, which was necessarily required to obedience, bee denied him? Nay rather, why doth he excuse himselfe, when he can impute the hardnesse of hart to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly readie to mocke them out if they might, are throwen downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chiefe profite towards the faithfull is to be considered: in whom as the Lorde worketh all things by his spirite, so he leaueueth not the instruments of his worde, and vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stande which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I will giue them a new hart, that they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their dutie, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? Why are they mouued with exhortation, sith they can make no more haste than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, sith they fell by the necessaric weaknesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receiue the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godly, but to reprove them of sinne, they were euen for that thing onlie to be counted not altogether vprofitable. Nowe, forasmuch as by the holie Ghost working inwardly, they much auaille to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake off sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasure and venomous sweetenesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred of yrkefomnesse thercof: who dare caunt that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer answer, let him take this: God worketh after two sorts in his elect, inwardly by his spirit, outwardly by his worde: By his spirite, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their harts to the loue and keeping of iustice, he maketh them a newe creature: By his worde, he stirreth them to desire, to seeke and attaine the same renuing, by them both he sheweth forth the effectuell working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution.

The use of exhortations both vnto wicked and so godly men.

distribution. When he sendeth the same worde to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to serue for another vse: that both for the present time they may be pressed with wittnes of conscience, & may against the day of iudgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man cometh to him, but whom the father draweth, and that the elect do come when they haue heard and learned of the Father: yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whom it necessarily behooueth to be inwardly taught by the holy ghost, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the fauour of death to death, but a sweete fauour to God.

Ioh. 6. 44.

2. Cor. 2. 16.

The lacke of free will in man end of abilitie to performe the lawe doth not prouue the lawe to be giuen in vaine.

6 They be very laborious in heaping together of testimonies of Scripture: and that they do of purpose, that when they cannot oppresse vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it commeth to hande strokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and shewe soeuer it hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it bee verie easie for vs to ouerthrowe them with all their route. For, because the places that they abuse against vs, when they are once diuided into their orders, do meete vpon a fewe speciall points, wee shall with one aunswere satisfie manie of them: therefore it shall not be needfull to carrie vpon dissoluing euery one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commandements, which they thinke to be so tempered to our strengthes, that whatsoeuer is proued to be required by the one, it necessarily followeth, that it may be performed by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the commandements, and by them do measure the proportion of our strength. For (saie they) either God mocketh vs when he chargeth vs with holinesse, godlinesse, obedience, chastitie, loue and meekenesse: and when hee forbiddeth vs vncleannesse, idolatrie, vnchastnesse, wrath, robbetrie, pride, and such like: or he requireth onely those things that are in our power. Now we may diuide into three sorts in manner all the commandements that they heape together. Some require our first conuersion to God, some speake simplicie of the keeping of the lawe: some command vs to continue in the grace of God that we haue received. First let vs speake of them all in generalitie, and then descend to the speciall sorts. To extend the power of man to the commandements of the lawe, hath indeede long agoe begonne to be common, and hath some shewe: but it proceeded from most rude ignorance of the lawe. For they that thinke it a heinous offence, if it be saide that the keeping of the lawe is impossible, do rest forsooth vpon this most strong argument, that elsse the lawe was giuen in vaine. For they speake in such sort, as if Paul had no where spoken of the law. For, I beseech them, what meane these sayings, that the lawe was set because of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: that the lawe maketh sinne: that the lawe entred, that sinne might abound: was it ment that the lawe was to be limited to our strengthes, least it should be giuen in vaine? or rather that it was set farre about vs to conuince our weaknesse? Truly by the same mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the lawe is charitie. But when he witheth the mindes of the Thessalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the lawe foundeth in our eares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our harts.

The vse which the lawe of God sheweth vs in, althoough our weaknesse doe not serue vs finally.

7 Truly, if the Scripture did teach nothing elsse, but that the lawe is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeouour, I would also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare vnto vs the manifold vse of the lawe: it is conuenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause: it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what wee ought to doe, the power to obey cometh of the goodnesse of God, and therefore moueth vs to prayer, whereby we may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundment and no promise, then were our strengths to be tried whether they were sufficient to answer the commaundment, but sith there are promises ioyned withall, which crie out, that not onely our aide, but also all our whole power consisteth in the helpe of Gods grace, they doe testifie ynough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more insufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengths with the commaundments of Gods lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured therule of iustice, which he purposed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weaknesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how vnreadie wee are of our selues which in euery behalfe doe so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shall be perswaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his lawe to stockes and stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stockes nor stones, when being taught by the lawe that their lustes doe striue against God, they are prooued guiltie by their owne witnesse. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weaknesse they flie vnto grace. For which purpose seue these sayings of Augustine. The Lorde commaundeth those things that we cannot doe, that we may knowe what we ought to aske of him. Great is the profite of the commaundments, if so much be giuen to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commaundeth, yea the lawe therefore commaundeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commaunded by the lawe: yea, God requireth faith it selfe of vs, and findeth not what to require vnlesse he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what he commaundeth, and commaund what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be seene in rehearsing the three sortes of commaundments which we touched before. The Lorde oftentimes commaundeth both in the law and in the Prophets, that we be conuerted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Conuert me Lord, and I shall be conuerted: for after that thou didst conuert me, I repented, &c. He commaundeth vs to circumcise the vncircumcised skin of our hart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hand. He each where requireth newnesse of hart, but in another place hee testifieth that it is giuen by himselfe. That which God promiseth (saith Augustine) we doe not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note, that he himselfe rehearseth in the sith place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betwene the lawe and the promises, or betwene the commaundments and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commaundments whether man be able to doe any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commaundments themselves are fulfilled. The commaundments of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serue and cleaue vnto his will; to keepe his commaundments, to followe his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gift whatsoeuer righteousness, holinesse, godlinesse, or puritie may be had. Of the thirde sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, sith he, brethren, be yee strong thorough the Lord. In another place he forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieue the spirite of God, wherewith wee are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that hee threerequireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wisheth it to the Thessalonians, from God, namely that he would reckon them worthe of his holy calling: and fulfill all the purpose of his goodnesse, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the seconde Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, he oftentimes commendeth their good and godly will, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the hart

9 The craftier sort of them doe cauil at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that we may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weak endeouours. They bring also places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conuersion seemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne yee to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lord bringeth vs, we haue aboue shewed, and it is not needefull here to repeat it. This one thing I woulde haue graunted me, that it is vainly gathered, that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, because God doth commaund the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the commaundements of God, the grace of the lawe giuer is both necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby then it appeereth, that at the least there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie cannot be wiped away with any cauillations: that the couenant of God made with the ancient people was voide, because it was onely literal, and that it could no otherwise be established, than when the spirite commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Turne yee to me, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their error. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he reneweth our harts to repentance, but wherewith he by prosperitie of things doth declare himselfe fauourable and mercifull: as by aduersitie he sometime sheweth his displeasure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many sorts of miseries, & calamities, did complaine that God was turned away from them: he answereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they returne to vprightnesse of life, and to himselfe that is the patterne of rightcoulnesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawn to this purpose, that the worke of our conuersion should seeme to be parted betweene God and men. These things we haue comprehended so much the shortlyer, because the proper place for this matter shall be where we intreate of the lawe.

10 The second sort of their arguments is much like vnto the first. They alleadge the promises whereby God doth couenant with our will, of which sort are: Seeke good and not euill, and ye shall liue. If ye will and doe heare, ye shall eate the good things of the earth: but if yee will not, the sworde shall deuoure you, because the Lordes mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driuen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and doe all his commaundements which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God will set thee on high aboue all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefites which the Lorde doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lorde doth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vpon our will, if the same will be not in our power: And that this liberalitie of God shoulde be a goodly thing forsooth, if he so set his benefites before vs, that we haue no power to vse them: and a maueulous assurednesse of his promises, which hang vpon a thing impossible, so as they might neuer bee fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adioyned, wee will speake in another place: so that it shall bee plaine, that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I denie that God doth vngrately mocke vs, when hee moueth vs to deserue his benefites, whome he knoweth to be vterly vnable to doe it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithful and to the wicked, they haue their vse with both sorts. As God with his commaundements pricketh the consciences of the wicked, that they should not too sweetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his iudgements: so in his promises hee doth in a manner take them to witness, how vnworthie they are of his goodnesse. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and conuenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whom he is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Maestie, according to his seueritie? Therefore God doth well and orderly when in his promises he adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bounde with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then onely enioy his benefites, if they departe from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may vnderstande that they are woorthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, bicause he seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not be inconuenient, if he attempt the same thing also by promises, which we haue shewed that hee hath done to great profite with commaundements toward them. Being enforced of the will of God, by his commaundements, we are put in minde of our miserie, which doe withal our heart too farre dissent from the same, and wee bee therewithall pricked forward to call vpon his spirite, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commaundements, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetnesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that we haue of righteousnesse, we may be the more feruent to seeke the fauour of God. Loe how in these requestes (if you will: If you shall heare,) the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

11 The thirde sort of their arguments, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthankfull people, and saith that they themselues onely were the cause that they received not of his tender loue all kinde of good things. Of which sort are the places: Amaleck and the Chananees are before you, with whose sworde you shall fall, bicause yee would not obey the Lorde, because I called and yee answered not, I will do to this house as I did to Silo. Againe, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lorde their God, nor hath received discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde. Againe, because yee haue hardened your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euils are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) coulde such reproches be layde against them which might readily aunswere? As for vs, wee loued prosperitie, and feared aduersitie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoide the other we obeyed not the Lord, nor hearkened to his voice: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, bicause we were subiect to the dominion of sinne. Vainely therefore are these euils layde to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoide. But leauing the pretence of necessitie, wherein they haue but a weake and sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge themselves of all fault. For if they be founde guiltie of any fault, then the Lorde doth not without cause reprove them, that it came to passe by their peruersnesse, that they felt not the fruit of his clemencie. Let them aunswere therefore, whether they can denie, that their froward will was the cause of their stubbornnesse. If they find the spring head of the euill within themselves, why gape they to finde out strange causes, that they might seeme not to haue bene authors of their owne destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both deprived of the benefites of God, and chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinately forward in their faultes, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vniust crueltie: that if they haue not cast off all willingesse to learne, they may be wearie of their sinnes, by the desertings whereof they see themselves miserable and vndone, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord reherfeth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemne prair of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleaged, did auail to the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Iewes, to whom Hieremie is commaunded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not haue fallen otherwise than the Lord had foresaide. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these wordes, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not aunswere thee. To what end then did they sing to deafe men? that being euen loth and vnwilling, yet they should vnderstand that it was true that they heard, that it were wicked sacriledge if they should lay vpon God the blame of their euils which rested in themselves. By these few solutions thou maist easily deliuer thy self from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to erect an image of free wil, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandements as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalmes concerning the Iewes: A froward generation that haue not made their heart straight. Also in another Psalm, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the perversnesse of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is onely of God. The Prophet saith: I haue inclined my hart to keepe thy commandements, because he had willingly and with a cherefull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet he doth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Psalm to bee the gift of God. Therefore wee must holde in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne saluation with feare and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the performing. In deede hee assigneth them offices, to be doing, that they should not giue themselves to sluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that he commaundeth them to haue feare and carefulnesse, he so humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commaunded to do, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worke passively, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heauen, that they should claime nothing at all to themselves. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we should adde power in faith, he graunteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing feuerally by our selues, but onely he awaketh the slothfulnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choaked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paul: Extinguish not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doth oftentimes creepe vpon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choise to cherish the light being offered them, his ignorance shall be easily confuted: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, cometh onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commaunded to purge our selues from all filthinesse: whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conuoyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plain by the wordes of Iohn: Whoso euer is of God, saueh himselfe. The aduancers of free will take holde of this saying, as if we were saued partly by the power of God, and partly by our own:

 as though we had not from heauen the verie same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to saue vs from euill, and wee know that the godly, while they warre against Satan, do get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God, Wherefore when Peter commaunded vs, to purifie our soules in the obedience of truth, he by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength is of no force in the spirituall battell, Iohn briefly sheweth, when he saith, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sin, because the seede of God abideth in them. And in another place he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victory that ouercommeth the world.

1. Iohn 5. 4.

12 Yet there is alleged a testimony out of the Law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of the Law, he protesteth vnto the people in this manner. The commandement that I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre off: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy hart, thou shouldest doe it. Truly, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandements, I graunt they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easines and readinesse of obseruation, but of knowledge: yet euen so peraduenture it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospell. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, that they might be drawn to the Gospell, although his boldnesse so to say shall not be without impietie, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to conuince him withall. For if Moses spake of the commandements onely, then he puffd vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they else haue done, but thrown themselues downe headlong, if they had taken vpon them the keeping of the Law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the Law, where there is no access vnto it, but by a headlong fall to destruction? Wherefore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moses in these words did meane the couenant of mercie, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the Law. For in a few verses before he had taught, that our harts must be circumcised by the hand of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed that easinesse, whereof he straightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the helpe and succor of the holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightily in our weakenes. Albeit the place is not simply to be vnderstanded of the commandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospell, which are so farre from stablishing a power in vs to obtaine righteousnesse, that they vtterly ouerthrowe it. Paul considering that same, prooueth by this testimony, that saluation is offered vs in the Gospell, not vnder that hard and impossible condition, wherewith the Law dealeth with vs, that is, that they onely shall attaine it which haue fulfilled all the commandements, but vnder a condition that is easie, readie, and plaine to come vnto. Therefore this testimony maketh nothing to chalenge freedom to the will of man.

When Moses doth seeme to intimate a kinde of facultie in man to fulfill the Law of God: he meaneth by the Law the promise of the Gospell, which are easly receiued not in respect of our habitie but of Gods mercie which worketh mightily in framing our harts.

Rom. 10. 8.

Deu. 30. 8.

13 There are also certaine other places wont to be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing the succor of his grace, trieth men, and watech to see to what ende they will apply their endeouours, as is that place in Osie: I will goe to my place till they put it in their hart and seeke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seeke his face, vnlesse their mindes were pliable that they might after their owne will incline themselves to the one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly vsed with God in the Prophets, to make a shew as if hee did despise and cast away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduersaries gather out of such threatenings? If they meane to gather, that the people being forsaken of God, may purpose their owne saluation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessary to conuersion, why striue they with vs? But they so graunt it necessary, that still they will haue mans power preferred vnto him. How prooue they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it.

That God is said to withdraw his succor, and to trie whether men will seeke after him, is no argument that of themselves they can seeke vnto him: but that he by hiding his face doth bring them to see that without his grace they are nothing.
Osie. 5. 14

For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will doe being giuen our and left to himselfe, and another thing to helpe his litle strength after the measure of his weakenes. What then (will some man say) doe these manners of speaking meane? I answere that they are asmuch in effect, as if God had said: For asmuch as I preuaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw my selfe awhile: and sit still and suffer them to be afflicted: I will see if at length, after long miseries, they will begin to remember mee, to seeke my face. The Lords going farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecie: his looking what men will doe, signifieth that he keeping silence, and as it were hiding himselfe, doth for a time exercise them with diuerse afflictions. Both these things he doth to humble vs the more. For we should sooner be dulled than amended with the scourges of aduersitie, vnlesse he did frame vs to that tractableness by his spirite. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obstinate stubborneesse, doth for a time leaue vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine presence of himselfe) and doth make a prooffe what we would doe in his absence, it is falsly gathered hereof that there is any strength of free will that he should beholde and trie, forasmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to drine vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

Mat. 6.

14 They bring also for their defence the continuall manner of speaking, that is vsed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good workes are called ours, and it is no lesse said that we doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, than that we commit sinnes. But if sinnes be iustly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truly in righteous doings also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned vnto vs. For it were against reason that it should be said that we doe those things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motion, we are moued by God like stones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shew that our endeour hath also yet a second part. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good workes are called ours, I would object againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to haue giuen vs of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifullnesse and free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which otherwise is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the same absurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no proprietie, but by the liberalitie of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our selues doe worship God, obey the Law and apply good workes. Sith these are the duties properly belonging to the minde and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to vs, vnlesse there were a certaine communicating of our endeour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily vnwinde our selues, if we well consider the manner how the spirite of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherewith they eniuously presse vs is from the purpose, for who is so fond to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing follow of our doctrine. We reckon among the naturall powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will and not to will, to endeour and to resist, that is, to allow vanitie and to refuse perfect goodnesse, to will euill and to be vnwilling to good, to endeour our selues to wickednesse, and to resist righteousnesse. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vse that peruerfenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what ende he will, that he by an euil hand may execute his good worke. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so serueth the power of God, when he laboureth onely to obey his owne lust, to a stone that being throwen by the violence of another, is carried neither with moouing nor tence nor will of his owne? We see how much difference there is. But what doth doth he in good things, of which is our principall question? when he erecteth his kingdome in them, he by his spirite restraineth mans will, that it be not caried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousnesse, he boweth, frameth, fashioeneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousnesse: and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth stablish and confirme it with the strength of his spirite. For which reason Augustine saith: Thou wilt say vnto me: then are we wrought and worke not. Yea, thou both workest and art wrought, and thou workest well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirite of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the mouing of the holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnes. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that we also doe worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing seuerally to vs: but because he would not cherish slothfulnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he said a litle before, Vnlesse God helpe vs, we shall not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the worde is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct and gouerne the will of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnlesse it correct it, reforme it, and renew it (from whence wee say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and vnlesse it mooue it, stirre it, druuie it forward, carie it, and holde it. Whereupon we doe truly say, that all the dooings that proceede from it, are wholly the onely worke of the same grace. In the meane time we deny not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things doe it and very well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultines and peruersnes thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of iustice: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth vterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrarie, but that we may well be said to doe the same thing that the spirite of God doth in vs, although our owne will doe of it selfe giue vs toward it nothing at all that may be seuered from his grace. And therefore wee must keepe that in minde, which we haue elsewhere alleaged out of Augustine, that some doe in vaine trauaill to finde in the will of man some good thing that is properly hir owne. For whatsoever mixture men study to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoever good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to will, it is not without cause said, that we doe those things whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoever by his goodnes he worketh in vs, so that we vnderstand it to be not of our selues: and then because the minde is ours, the will is ours, the endeuor is ours, which are by him directed to good.

16 Those other testimonies beside these, that they scrape together here & there, shall not much trouble euen meane wits that haue well conceiued only the solutions aboue said. They alleadge that saying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be vnder thee, and thou shalt beare rule ouer it. Which they expound of sin, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of sin should not get the vpper hand in his minde, if he would labor in subduing of it. But we say that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reprocue the wickednes of the enuie that Cain had conceiued against his brother. And that he

Those things which the grace of the Spirit worketh in vs, wee our selues are said to doe, because the faculties whereby we worke and the vertue all of working are ours, although the mouing and the stablishing them to good be wholly and meere ly his.

That which is spoken to Cain concerning the subiection of appetite is farre from proving free will. Gen. 4.7.

doth two waies. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excel his brother in gods sight, before whom no honour is giuen but vnto righteousness: the other, that he was too much vnthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him subiect vnder his authority. But lest we should seem therfore to embrace this exposition, because the other is against vs: let vs admit that God spake of sin. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he cōmand, then haue we already shewed, that thereby followeth no prooffe of the power of man. If he promise, where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subiect to sin, ouer which he should haue had dominion. They will say, that in the promise was included a secret condition, as if it had bene said, that he should haue the victory if he would strue for it. But who wil receiue these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sin, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be about our power. Albeit both the matter it selfe & the order of Grammar do require, that there be a comparison made of Cain and Abel, because the elder brother should not haue bin set behind the yonger, vnles he had become woorse by his owne wicked doing.

17 They vse also the testimonie of the Apostle, which saith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mans will and endeuor, which of it selfe though it be weak, being holpē by the mercie of God, is not without prosperous success. But if they did soberly wey what matter Paul there intreateth of, they would not so vnadvisedly abuse this sentence. I knowe that they may bring foorth Origen and Hierone for maintainers of their exposition: and I could on the other side let Augustine against them. But what they haue thought it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that saluation is prepared only for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth to graunt his mercie: and that ruine and destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had vnder the example of Pharao declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the assured estate of free election by the testimonie of Moses, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercie. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus vnderstanded, that will or endeuor are not sufficient, because they are too weake for so great a weight, that which Paul saith, had not been aptly spoken: Therefore away with these subtilties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some wil, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simply, thus: it is not wil, it is not running that get vs the way to saluation, herein is only the mercie of god. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that the goodnesse and kindnes of God appeareth not by the workes of righteousness which we haue done, but for his infinite mercie. They themselves that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he said, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not giue me leaue to reason after the same fashion, that we haue done some good workes, because Paul saith, that we haue not attained the goodnes of God by the good workes that we haue done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shall perceiue that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine reflecteth vpon, if it were therefore said that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrarie part that it is not of the mercie of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurditie, Augustine doth rightfully conclude, that this is spoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to will and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs.

talium.

No lesse vnaptly doe some wrēt that saying of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be restrained onely to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselves, but because God vseth their seruice, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie gifts. 1. Cor. 3. 9

18 They bring foorth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not vnknown, is a writer of whose authoritie is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth hee testifie for free will? He saith, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hand of his owne counsell: that commandmentes were giuen him, which if he obserued, he should againe be preferred by them: that before man was set life and death, good and euill: that whatsoever he would, should bee giuen him. Bee it, that man receiued from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if on the other side we answer that he lost it? Truly my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create vpright, and hee forged vnto himselfe many inuentions. But because man in swearing, loit as it were by ihuwracke both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answer, not to them onely, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine saluation, thy authoritie is not of to great force with vs, that it may be any preiudice, be it neuer so small, against the vndoubted word of God. But if thou onely study to restraints the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of his owne euils vpon God, vseth to seeke a vaine defence for it selfe, and therefore thou answerest that vprightnes was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree vnto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that so we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender. Eccles. 7. 30.

19 Yet they haue nothing oftener in their mouth than the parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theeuers laid abroad halfe dead in the way. I know that it is common almost with all writers, that the calamitie of mankind is represented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon doe our aduersaries gather an argument, that man is not so maymed with the robbery of sinne and the deuill, but that he keepeth still remaying the leauings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that he was left halfe alieue. For where is that halfe life, vnlesse some portion both of right reason and will remayned? First if I would not giue place to their allegorie, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was deniued by the fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to goe no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before them: so far is it off, that they be by themselves sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, overthrow this deuise, for the word of God leauech not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that hee is vterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when he speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, when we were halfe dead and halfe alieue, but that we were raised vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe alieue to receiue the light of Christ, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like manner speaketh the Lorde himselfe, when he saith, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voice. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this allegorie haue the force of a certaine testimonie, yet what shall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe a liue, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I graunt: he hath a wit capable of vnderstanding, although it pearce not to the heauenly and spirituall wisdome: he hath The will of man through the wound of original sinne was not left halfe dead and halfe alieue, as some would gather by the parable of the wayfaring man, wher theeuers left lying in the high way. true iudgement of honestie: he hath some feeling of the Godhead, howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truly they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine be taken frō vs, which is also approoued by common consent of the Schooles: that after mans fall the freely giuen good things, whereupon saluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall giftes are corrupted and defiled. Let therefore this truth remaine with vs vndoubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the rightcousnes of God, that it conceiuech, coueteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, vncleannesse, and mischief: that his heart is so thoroughly soked in poysin of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they do vtter any goodnesse in shew, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocrisie and deceitfull crookednes, and the hart entangled with inward peruerfnes.

The vj. Chapter.

That man being lost, must seeke for redemption in Christ.

Except we know the fatherly goodnes of God (shining in the face of Iesus Christ), which knowledge is attained vnto by the Gospel, other knowing of God is far forth as he may be known by his creatures, neither hath bene to any ones saluation since the fall of Adam, neither can be to ours satisficently available.

Sith all mankind hath perished in the person of Adam, that excellencie and nobilitie of beginning which we haue spoken of, would so little profite vs, that it would rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeare the redeemer in the person of his onely begotten sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sinne to be his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creatour whereof we haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting forth God a father vnto vs in Christ. Truly this was the naturall order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godlinesse, from whence might be made a passage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but since our falling away, whither soeuer we turne our eies, vpperward and downeward, the curse of God still presenteth it selfe vnto our sight, which while it possesseth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needs ouerwhelme our owne soules with desperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly fauour toward vs do still many waies appeare: yet by beholding of the world we cannot gather that he is our Father when our conscience inwardly pricketh vs, and sheweth that there is in sin iust cause of forsaking, why God should not account or recken vs for his children. Beside that there is in vs both slothfulnesse and vnthankfulnesse: because both our mindes, as they bee blinded, doe not see the truth, and also as all our senses be peruerse, we maliciously defraude God of his glorie. Therefore we must come to that saying of Paul: because in the wisdom of God, the world knew not God by wisdom, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to saue them that beleeeue. The wisdom of God he calleth this honourable stage of heauen and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof we ought wisely to haue known God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the faith of Christ, which for that it seemeth foolish, the vnbeleeuers do disdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the crosse doe not agree with mans wit, yet ought wee humbly to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator and maker, that he may begin againe to be our father. Truly since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God amounted to saluation, without the Mediatour. For Christ speaketh not of his own age onely, but comprehendeth all ages, when he saith that this is the eternall life, to knowe the Father the one true God, and him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the sower is their sluggishnesse, which take vpon them to set open heauen to prophane and vnbeleeuing men, without his grace, whom the Scripture each where where teacheth to be the onely gate whereby we enter into saluation. But if any will reſtraine that ſaying of Chriſt onely to the publiſhing of the Goſpell, we haue in readines wherewith to confute him. For this hath bene a common ſentence in all ages & among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are eſtranged from God, and pronounced accuſed, and the children of wrath, cannot pleaſe God. And here may be alſo alleaged that which Chriſt answered to the woman of Samaria: Yee worſhip what yee know not, but we worſhip that which we know: becauſe the ſaluation is from the Iewes. In which wordes hee both condemneth of falſhood all the religions of the Gentiles, and alſo aſſigneth a reaſon why, for that the Redeemer was promiſed vnder the lawe to the onely choſen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worſhip euer pleaſed God, but that which had reſpect vnto Chriſt. For which cauſe alſo Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and void of the hope of life. Nowe where as Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Chriſt, and that all the worlde fell from it, wee muſt returne to the ſame fountaine Chriſt. And therefore Chriſt, inſomuch as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himſelfe to be the life. And truly the entrance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the bodie of the onely begotten ſonne. And Iohn plainly teſtifieth, that they which beleue in his name, are made the children of God. But becauſe it is not directly my purpoſe yet to diſcouer of faith in Chriſt, therefore it ſhal for this time be ſufficient to haue touched it by the way.

Joh. 4. 21.

Eph. 2. 12.

2 And therefore God neuer ſhewed himſelfe mercifull to the olde people, nor euer did put them in any hope of grace without the mediator. I omit to ſpeake of the ſacrifices of the law, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that ſaluation is no where elſe to be ſought, but in the cleaſing which was performed by Chriſt alone. Onely this I ſaie, that the bleſſed and happie ſtate of the Church hath bene alway grounded vpon the perſon of Chriſt. For though God comprehended all the iſſue of Abraham in his couenant, yet doth Paul wiſely reaſon, that Chriſt is properly that ſeede in whom all nations were to be bleſſed, for aſmuch as we know that not all they were reckened his ſeede that were begotten of him according to the fleſh. For (to ſpeake nothing of Iſmael and other) how came it to paſſe, that of the two ſonnes of Iſaac, that is Eſau and Jacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was choſen the other reſuſed? Yea, how came it to paſſe that the elder was reiected and the younger onely tooke place? And howe alſo came it to paſſe, that the greater part ſhould be forſaken? It appeereth therefore, that the ſeede of Abraham was principally reckened in one perſon, and that the promiſed ſaluation did neuer ſtande ſure till it came to Chriſt, whoſe office is to gather together the things that were ſcattered abroad. Therefore the fiſt adoption of the choſen people did hang vpon the grace of the Mediator. Which though it be not in ſo plaine wordes expreſſed by Moſes, yet it ſufficiently appeereth that it was commonly knowne to all the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicitie of the godly, euen then ſaide thus in her ſong: God ſhall give ſtrength to his king, and ſhall exalt the horne of his annointed. In which wordes the meaneſt that God ſhall bleſſe his Church. Wherewith alſo agreeeth the oracle that is within a hile after adioyned: The Prieſt whom I ſhal appoint ſhal walk before mine annointed. Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heauenly father was to haue the liuely image of Chriſt to be ſcene in Dauid and his poſteritie. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kiſſe the Sonne. Wherewith this ſaying of the Goſpell alſo agreeeth: He that honoureth not the ſonne, honoureth nor the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes

the kingdome decayed: yet it behooued the couenant to stand which God had made in Dauid and his successours: as also he said by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut off the kingdome, for Dauid my seruants sake, and for *Hierusalem*s sake, whom I haue chosen: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressly addeth: I will afflict the seed of Dauid, but not for euer. Within a litle space of time after, it is said: For Dauid his seruants sake God hath giuen a light in Hierusalem, to raise vp a sonne, and to keepe Hierusalem in safetie. Now when the state grewe towarde destruction, it was saide againe: God would not scatter Iuda for Dauid his seruants sake, because he had spoken that he would giue a light to him and his sonnes for euer. Finally, this is the summe, that all other being passed ouer, onely Dauid was chosen, vpon whom the good pleasure of god should rest. As in another place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Ioseph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. He hath chosen his seruant Dauid to feede Iacob his people, and Israell his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to saue his church, that the safetie and preservation thereof shoulde hang vpon that one head, and therefore Dauid crieth out, The Lorde, the strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by hee addeth a praier: Saue thy people and blesse thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with vnseperable knot ioyned to the gouernment of Christ. And in the same meaning in another place: Lord saue vs: Let the king heare vs in the day that we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithful did vpon none other confidence flie to the helpe of God, but because they were hidden vnder the succour of the king. Which is gathered by another Psalm. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plaine inough, that the faithfull are called backe vnto Christ, that they may hope that they shall be saued by the hand of God. The same respect hath the other praier, where all the church calleth vpon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hand, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou hast preferred (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the Psalm bewaileth the scattering abroad of the whole people, yet he praieeth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, and all things to mans seeming destroyed, Ieremie lamenteth the ouerthrowe of the Church, he doth principallie complaine that by destruction of the kingdome all hope was cut off from the faithfull. Christ (saith he) the spirit of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom wee saide: In thy shadow we shall liue among the nations. Heereby nowe it sufficientlie appeereth that because God cannot be mercifull to mankinde without the Mediatour, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fathers in time of the lawe, to whom they might direct their faith.

3 Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliuerance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is auanced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messias, saith Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to Dauid, concerning the euerlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no maruell. For otherwise there had been no assurance of the couenant. For which purpose serueth that notable answer of Esay. For when he sawe that the vnbeleueing king Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safetie, as it were sordainly, he passed ouer to Messias. Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a sonne, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardnes refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselves to discredite the truth of God, yet the couenant should not be voide, but that the redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the ende they might shewe that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdom of Dauid, whereupon hanged the redemption and euersisting saluation. So Esay saith: I will make a covenant with you the faithfull mercies of Dauid. Esay. 55. 3. Behold I haue giuen him for a witness vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise haue any hope, but by the meanes of him being witness, that God would be appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremie, to raise them vp being in despaire, saith: Behold the daies come, wherein I will raise vp vnto Dauid a righteous branch, and then shall Iuda be faued, and Israel shall dwell in safetie. And Ezechiel saith, I will raise vp one shepheard euer my sheepe, euen Dauid my seruant. I the Lord will bee a God to them, and my seruant Dauid for a shepheard. And I will make a covenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after he had entreated of the incredible renewing, he saith: my seruant Dauid shall be their king, and there shall be one shepheard ouer all, and I will make an euersisting covenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places our of many, because I onely meane to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway bene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeably hereunto, as it is saide in Osee. The children of Iuda and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall appoint to themselues one head. Which he afterwarde more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall seeke for the Lorde their God, and Dauid their king. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressly saith, The king shall goe before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renewing of the people saith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of Dauid that is fallen downe, and I will hedge vp the gaps, and raise vp the places ouerthrowen, euen because that was the onely standard of saluation, to haue the royall glorie to rise vp againe on high in the stock of Dauid, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doth he more plainly crie out: be glad thou daughter of Sion, reioice thou daughter of Hierusalem. Beholde thy king cometh, righteous and lauded. Which agreeth with the place of the Psalm before alleged: The Lorde the strength of the saluations of his annointed, Lorde saue vs. Where saluation is deriued from the head to the whole bodie.

4 It was Gods will to haue the Iewes instructed with these prophecies, that to seeke for their deliuerance, they should bend their eyes directly to Christ. And though they had shamefully swarued, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be abolished, that God by the hande of Christ, as he had promised to Dauid, would be the deliuerer of the Church, and so the covenant should be of his owne free graunt, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this long founded in the mouth of the children when Christ a litle before his death entred into Hierusalem, Hosanna to the sonne of Dauid. For it appeereth that it was commonly known and spoken of, and according to common vse that they sung that the onely pledge of Gods mercie remained vnto them, in the comming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainly and perfectly beleue in God, biddeth them to beleue on himselfe, Beleue yee in God (saith he) then beleue also in me. For though (to speake properly) saith climeth vp from Christ to the father, yet he meaneth that the same faith, albeit it rest vpon God, doth by litle and litle vanish away vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that creepe vpon the grounde like wormes, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that come saying, that God is the object of faith, but in such sort that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if wee finde not God in Christ, saluation cannot be knowen vnto vs. For although among the Jewes, the Scribes and Pharises had darkened with false inuentions, that which the Prophets had spoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ tooke it for a thing confessed as receiued by common consent, that there was none other remedie in a dispaired case, and none other meane of deliuering the Church, but by giuing the Mediator. In deede that was not commonly knowen among the people as it ought to haue been, which Paul teacheth, that Christ is the end of the lawe. But how true and assured it is, doth plainly appeere by the lawe and the Prophets. I speake not yet of faith, because there shall be elsewhere a more conuenient place for it. Onely let the readers hold this as fast established, that the first degree of godlinesse be, to acknowledge God to be a Father vnto vs, to defend, gouerne, and cherish vs, till he gather vs together into the euerlasting inheritance of his kingdome: and that hereby it plainly appeereth which we said euen now, that the knowledge of God which bringeth saluation, standeth not without Christ, and that therefore from the beginning he hath bene set forth vnto all the elect, that they should looke vpon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Irenaeus, that the Father which is vnmeasurable, is in his Sonne measured, because he hath applied himselfe to the measure of our capacitie, least he should drowne our mindes with the vnmeasurableness of his glorie. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, doe wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christ but a portion of the godhead deriued from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone. That saying of John hath alwaies bene true. He that hath not the Sonne, neither hath he the Father. For though in olde time many did boast that they worshipped the soueraigne God, the maker of heauen and earth: yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible that they should truly taste of the mercie of God, and so be perswaded that he was their father. Therefore because they knew not the head that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them, whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into grosse and filthie superstitions, they bewraied their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turks although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heauen and earth is their God, yet doe they thrust an idole in place of the true God while they swaue from Christ.

The vij. Chapter.

That the lawe was giuen, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ, vntill his comming.

The law was giuen by Moses to nourish men in hope of saluation by Christ, as appeareth by the often mentions which be maketh of the covenants, and by the whole forme of ceremonies and seruice therein prescribed, which without spirituall relation vnto this were vaine and idle.

BY this continuall processe that we haue rehearsed, may be gathered, that the law was added about fouer hundred yeeres after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to leade away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, that they should not waxe faint with long tarriance. I meane by this worde Lawe, not onely the ten commaundements, which prescribe a rule how to liue godlyly and righteously, but also the forme of religion deliuered by the hande of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawgiuer to abolish the blessing promised to the kindred of Abraham: but rather we see how euery where he putteth the Jewes in remembrance of the free covenant made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if he had bene sent to renew the same. That was most plainly set forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer vp loathsome stinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themselues to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloud to wash away their filthinesse? Finally, all the seruice of God appointed in the lawe (if it be considered by it selfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the truth should answer vnto) shall be but a verie mockerie. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, and in the Epistle to the Hebrues, is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commaundeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the paterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spirituall thing appointed that they should tend vnto, the Iewes should haue lessely spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Profane men that neuer earnestly applied the studie of godlinesse, can not without lothsome tediousnes abide to heare so many sundry fashions of vsages: and they not onely maruell why God wearied his people with such a heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorne them as childrens plaies. And the cause is, for that they consider not the ende, from which if the figures of the lawe be seuered, they must needes be condemned of vanitie. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore command sacrifices because hee would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their mindes higher. Which may also plainly appeere by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spirituall. This do the sayings of the Prophets testifie, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of sluggishnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of anie value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expositours of the lawe, so they would by this meane haue mens eyes directed to the marke from which the common people strayed. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes it is certainly gathered, that the lawe was not void of Christ. For Moses did set forth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they should become a priestly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine vnlesse there were had for the meane therof a great & more excellent reconciliation than by the blood of beasts. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondslaues of sinne, to be aduanced to royall dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glorie of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefit should come vnto them from elsewhere than from themselves? Also howe coulde the right of priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of finnes were abominable to God, vnlesse they had bene consecrate in a holie head? Wherefore Peter doth verie aptly turne that saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fulnesse of grace, the taste whereof the Iewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Christ: Yee are (saith he) a chosen kindred, a kingly priesthood. For to this end tendeth that turning of the words, to shew that they, to whom Christ appeered by the Gospell, haue obtained more than their fathers, because they are all ended both with priestly and kingly honour, that trusting vpon their mediatour, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

2 And heere by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdome which at length was erected in the house of Dauid, is part of the lawe, and contained vnder the Ministerie of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that aswell in all the kindred of the Leuites as in the posteritie of Dauid, Christ was set before the eyes of the olde people as in a double looking glasse. For, as I saide euen nowe, they coulde not otherwise bee before God either kings or priests, which were both the bondslaues of sinne and death, and defiled by their owne corruption. Heereby appeereth that that saying of Paul is most true; that the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a schoolemaster, till the seede came for whose sake the promise was giuen. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly knowen, they were like vnto children, whose weakenesse coulde not yet beare a full knowledge of heavenly things, but how they were by ceremonies, as it were lead by the hand to Christ, is spoken before, and may be better vnderstanded by many testimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to com daily with new sacrifices to appease God: yet Esay promiseth that all their finnes shall be clesed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniell agreably saith: The Priest^s appointed of the tribe of Leui, did enter into the Sanctuarie: but of the onely priest it was once saide, that by a oath he was chosen of God to be a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oyle was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shall be another manner of anointing. And because I will not tarrie vpon manie examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues cuen from the fourth Chapter to the eleuenth doth largely and plainly enough shewe, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth and vaine till wee come to Christ. As concerning the ten commandements: that lesion of Paul is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the end of the law vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueeth. And another lesion, that Christ is the Spirit that quickeneth the letter which of it selfe slaueth. For in the first of these two, he meaneth that righteousness is vainly taught by commandements, vntill Christ do giue it both by free imputation and by the spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it should nothing profite vs to know what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did succour vs fainting and oppressed vnder the yoke and vtollerable burden. In another place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie being proued guiltie of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to seeke Christ, whatsoever he teacheth in diuerse words do all verie well agree together. But because hee then was in contention with peruerse teachers, which fained that we do deserue righteousness by the workes of the law, to confute their error, he was compelled sometime to speake precisely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwile is clothed with the couenant of free adoption.

Although the law doe promise and would no doubts performe life vnto them tht keepe the law, yet can we looke for no fruit at all by those promises, but seeie our owne miserie thereby the more increased because of our weaknes which answereth not the righteousness prescribed by the law.
Deut. 30 19.

3 But now it is good to know, how being taught by the morall law, we are made more inexcusable, that our owne guiltinesse may moue vs to craue pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousness in the law: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousness before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heavenly throne of iudgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the lawe, dubbed not to protest before heauen and earth, that hee had set before Israel life and death, good and euill. And we may not denie, but that the rewarde of eternall saluation belongeth to the vpriight obedience of the lawe, as the Lorde hath promised it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether we performe that obedience, vpon desert whereof we may conceiue a trust of that rewarde. For to what small purpose is it, to see the rewarde of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse wee further knowe whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But heerein the weakenesse of the lawe doth shew it selfe. For because that keeping of the law is found in none of vs al, we are excluded from the promises of life, and do fall into curse onely. I do not now tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre about the power of man, he may indeede a farre off, looke at the promises, but yet not gather anie fruite of them. Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodnes of them he may the better wey his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of saluation being cut off, death doth certainly hang ouer him. On the other side do presse vs terrible penall lawes, which doe holde entangled and fast bound, not onely a fewe of vs, but euery one without exception: they presse vs, I say, and do pursue vs, with an vnappeafable rigour, so that we may see most present death in the law.

The promises of the lawe being conditional, are not of no effect vnto vs, though

4 Therefore if we looke onely vpon the law, we can doe nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and dispaire, forasmuch as by it we are all damned and cursed, and kept farre off from the blessednesse that he offerth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how finally doth it differ from mocking, mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhort men vnto it, to protest that it is laide open for vs, when in the meane season the entrie vnto it is foreclosed and impossible to be come to? I answer: although the promises of the lawe, in so much as they are conditionall, doe hang vpon the perfect obedience of the lawe, which can nowhere be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they shall be voided and of no effect vnto vs, vnlesse God embrace vs with his free goodnesse without regarde of our works, and vnlesse we doe embrace by faith the same goodnesse giuen vs by the gospell, then want they not their effectualnesse, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth so freely giue all things vnto vs, that he addeth this also to the heape of his bountifullnesse, that not refusing our halfe full obedience, and remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he fo maketh vs to enjoy the fruite of the promises of the lawe, as if we our selues had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this present proceede no further in this matter, because it shall be more largely to be entreated of, when we shall speake of the iustification of faith.

we be unable to performe the condition, because our not performing it through mercie pardoned, and our weak obedience accepted and rewarded, as if we were full performance.

5 Whereas we saide that it is impossible to keepe the lawe, that is in few wordes to be both expounded and proued. For it is woont among the people commonly to be accounted an opinion of great absurditie, so saue that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed: what Hierome thought, I doe nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is truth. I will not here make long circumstances of diuers sortes of possibilities. I call that impossible, which both neuer hath beene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If we record from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his hart, with all his munde, with all his soule, with all his power: Again, that there hath beene none that hath not beene troubled with concupiscence. Who can say nay? I see in deede what manner holy men foolish superstition doth imagine vnto vs, euen such whose purenesse the heavenly Angels doe scarcely counteruile: but against both the Scripture and proofe of experience. I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the maike of true perfection, vnlesse he be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon saide, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that sinneth not. And Dauid saide: euery liuing man shall not be iustified in thy sight. Iob in many places affirmeth the same. But Paw most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the flesh. And by no other reason he proueth that all that are vnder the lawe are subiect to the curse, but because it is written, that cursed are all they that doe not abide in all the commaundements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoeuer is forespoken by the Scriptures, that must be holden for perpetuall, yea and necessarie. With such succerie did the Pelagians trouble Augustine, saying, that there is wrong done to God, to say that he doth commaunde more than the faithfull are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to auoide their caullation confessed, that the Lorde might in deede, if he woulde, aduance a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will doe, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that doe I also not denie. But I adde further, that it is inconuenient to dispute of his power against his truth, and that therefore this sentence is not subiect to caullations if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, whereof the scriptures doe pronounce that it shall not be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saued, he answered: with men in deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stiffely defendeth, that in this flesh we neuer yeelde to God the due loue that we owe him.

The law is therefore said to be impossible for men to performe, because no man euer hitherto hath beene, and the scripture teacheth, that no man shall be so perfect.

Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of Loue (saith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath first fully knowen his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this world, see by a glasse and in a darke speech: it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controuersie, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfill the lawe, if we behold the weaknesse of our owne nature, as it shall yet also in another place be prooued by Paul.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vse of the lawe which they call Morall. Now, as far as I vnderstand, it is contained in these three parts. The first is, that while it sheweth to euery man the righteousnesse of God, that is, the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable to God, it admonish, certifie, prooue guiltie, yea and condemne euery man of his owne vnrighteousnesse. For so is it needfull that man blinded and drunke with loue of himselfe, be driuen both to the knowledge and the confession of his owne weaknesse, and vncleannesse: for as much as if his vanitie be not evidently conuincid, he swelleth with mad affiance of his owne strength, and can neuer be brought to thinke of the flendernesse thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoeuer he before conceiued a great opinion of it, yet by and by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, and then to shake and folter, at last euen to fall downe and faint. So being taught by the schooling of the lawe, he putteth off that arrogancie wherewith before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disease of pride, wherof we haue said that he is sicke. So long as he is suffred to stand to his owne iudgement, he deuiseth hypocrisie in steede of righteousnesse, wherewith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wot not what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compelled to trie his life by the balance of the law, then leauing the presumption of the counterfait righteousnesse, he seeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Again, that he sloweth full of infinite vices, wherof before he seemed cleane. For the euils of lust are hidden in so deepe and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceiue the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle saith, that he knew not lust, except the law had said: Thou shalt not lust: because except it be by the law disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly dart thereof.

7 So the law is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we behold, first our weaknesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our acursednesse, euen as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spots of our face. For when power faileth man to followe righteousnesse, then must he needes slicke fast in the mire of finnes. And after sinne by and by followeth curse. And of how much the greater transgression the lawe holdeth vs guiltie and conuict, with so much the more greuous iudgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne. For there he speaketh onely of the first office of the lawe, the prooue whereof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the law entred that sinne might abound, and therefore that it is the ministracion of death that worketh wrath and slaieth. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquitie with how much more vnderstanding of sin the conscience is striken, because vnto breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, because of it selfe it can doe nothing but accuse, condemne and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirite of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, onely to this end, to accuse vs and kill vs. And yet when this is saide, neither is the lawe dishonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof.

Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly

Rom. 7.7.

It is no dishonour to the lawe of God to say that it doth but represent vnto vs our inhabilitie to obey, our disobeying, & our cursed estate through disobedience: because in this we are caught both how our owne wickednesse hindereth vs from enioying the blessednesse of the law, & how the mercie of God aboundeth in giuing vs that blessednesse from which our owne wickednes doth in it selfe exclude vs.

plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to saluation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enimie with the spirituall lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for saluation, (if it had found fit hearers) urneth to the occasion of sinne and death. For sith we are all prooued transgressors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it discloieith our iniquitie: the more surely that it confirmeth the reward of life and saluation laid vp for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore that these sayings should be to the dishonor of the law, that they much auale to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruerfenes, that we enioy not the blessednesse of life set openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the succour of the lawe, is made so much the sweeter, and the mercie more louely that giueth it vnto vs, whereby we learne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new gifts vpon vs.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimony of the law, it is not done for this purpose (if at least we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with despaire, or with discouraged mindes to tumble downe headlong. In dedde the reprobate are amased after that manner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there belioeueth to be another ende of instruction. I graunt the Apostle testifieth that we are all condemned by iudgement of the law, that euery mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become bound vnto God: but yet the same Apostle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbeliefe, not to destroy all, or to suffer all to perishe, but that he might haue mercie of all, that leauing the foolish opinion of their owne strength, they might vnderstand, that they stand and are vpholden by the onely hande of God: that they being naked and emptie, may flee to his mercie, that they may rest themselues wholly vpon it, hide themselues wholly in it, take hold of it alone in steede of righteousnesse and merites, which is laide open in Christ for all men whoeuer they be that with true faith doe desire and looke for it. For God in the commandments of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteousnesse, whereof we all are destitute, and on the other side a rigorous iudge of euill doings. But in Christ, his face shineth full of grace and lenitie, euen toward the wretched and vnworthie sinners.

9 Of profiting to craue the grace of his helpe, Augustine speaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The law commandeth that enduouring to doe the things commanded, and being wearied with our weaknesse vnder the lawe, we should learne to aske the helpe of grace. Againe to Afelus: The profit of the law is to conuince man of his owne weaknesse, and compell him to craue the Phisicke of grace that is in Christ. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The law commandeth, and grace ministrerth strength to do. Againe to Valentine: God commandeth those things that we cannot do, that we may learne to know what to aske of him. Againe: The lawe was giuen to accuse you, that being accused you should feare, that fearing you should craue pardon, and not presume of your owne strengthes. Againe: The lawe was giuen for this purpose, of great to make little, to shew that thou hast no strength of thine owne to righteousnesse, that thou as poore, vnworthie and needie, shouldst flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his speech to God and saith: Doe so Lord, do so mercifull Lord, commande that which cannot be fulfilled: yea, commande that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfil it by their owne strength, euery mouth may be stopped, and no man may thinke himselfe great. Let all be little ones, and let all the world be guiltie before thee. But I am

The end why the law doth bring men to the sight of their owne miserie, is not that they might despaire, but that forsaking all confidence in themselves, they might rest vpon the mercie of Gods Sonne Christ alone.

Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of not wise to heape vp so many testimonies, sith that holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he had intuled, Of the spirit and Letter. The second proving he doth not so liuely describe, either because he knew that it did hang vpon the former, or because he did not so well vnderstand it, or because he wanted words wherewith distinctly and plainly to expresse his meaning of it, which yet he richly conceiued: but this first office of the law is not idle euen in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus far forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh they be renewed & flourish againe in the inward man, but amated with the first terror dole still in desperation: yet it serueth to new fourth the equite of Gods iudgement, that their consciences be tossed with such waies. For they euer willingly desire to make shift against the iudgement of God. Now while the time is not yet opened, they yet so astonishd with the testimonie of the law and their conscience do bewray in themselves what they haue defected.

The second office of the law is the bridling of their vniuerses thorough feare of punishment, without the spirit of sanctification which not is conducted with an inward horrie desire otherwise to serue God.

10 The second office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is iust and right, vnlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penall ordinaunces therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward mind is moued or affected withal, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke, and do keepe in their peruerseness within them, which other wise they would haue outrageously poured out. Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practise which they haue conceiued in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare and obedience of God, yea, the more that they hold backe themselves, so much the stronger within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, readie to doe any thing, and to breake forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spitefully hate the lawe, and do detest God the law-maker, so that if they could, they would verie faine take him away, whom they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth rightiull things, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the defuters of his maistie. In some indeede more darkly, and in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the lawe not by willing submission, but resisting and against their willes, onely by violence or feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousnes is necessarie for the publicke common state of men, the quiet wherof is herein provided for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with vprore, which would come to passe, if all things were lawfull for all men. Yea, it is not vnprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Schooling, so long as they before their calling being yet distant from the spirit of sanctification, are still wanted with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outward licentiousnes, by the terror of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in nature, they go for the present time but a litle forward, yet they partly grow in vnto beare the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and raw to discipline, as to a thing vnknown. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to haue touched, when he saith that the law was not set for the righteous man, but for the vniuersals and disobedient, wicked and sinners, euill doers and prophane men, slayers of their parents, and murderers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, lyers and perjured men, and whatsoever else is against found doctrine. For he saith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lusts of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

1. Tim. 1. 9.

Both sort of men schooled by the terror of the lawe as 11 But to both may that be applied which he saith in another place, that the lawe was to the Lawes a scholemaster to Christ, for there are two sort of men, whom with her schooling she leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort, of whom we first spake, because they are too full of affiance of their owne strength or righteounesse, are not meete to receiue the grace of Christ, vnlesse they be first emptied:

 therefore the Law bringeth them downe to humilitie by knowledge of themselues, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort neede a bridle to be holden backe, least they to giue loofe the reines to the wantonnes of their flesh, that they fall off altogether from all study of righteounesse. For where the spirite of God doth not yet governe, there sometime luffes do so boyle, that it is in great perill lest they throwe downe the soule that is subiect to them into the forgetfulnesse and despising of God: and so would it come to passe if God did not with this remedie prouide for it. Therefore those whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdome, if he doe not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the workes of the Law vnder feare, vntill the tunc of his visitation, not that chaste and pure feare such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacite be taught by introduction to true godlinesse Of this we haue so many pious examples, that it needeth no example. For whosoeuer haue any tunc continued in not knowing of God, wil con-fesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the Law in some feare and obedience of God, vntill the tunc that being regenerate by his spirite, they began hartly to loue him.

*well they shac

 Gal. 3. 24.*

12 The third vse, which is also the principall vse, and more neerely looketh vnto the proper end of the Law, concerneth the faithfull, in whose harts already inueth and reigneth the spirite of God. For although they haue the Law written and grauen in their harts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet soe they still two wayes profit in the Law. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily enter and more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord, which they aspire vnto, and may be confirmed in the vnderstanding thereof. As it a seruant be already bent with all the affection of his hart, to please his Lord, yet hath he neede diligently to search out and marke the fauions of his Lord, that he may frame and apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt himselfe from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by dayly instruction of the Law get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because wee neede not onely doctine but also exhortation: this other profite shall the seruant of God take by the Law, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slippery way of offending. For after this manner, must they holy ones drue forward themselves, which with how great cheerefulness so euer they trauaile to Godwards according to the spirite, yet they are alwaie loden with the sluggishnesse of the flesh, that they proceede not with such full readinesse as they ought. To this flesh is the Lawe giuen as a whippe, that like a slowe and dull Ass it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Euen to this vse Dauid had respect, when he did set foorth the Law with those notable parables: The Law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: the iudges of the Lord are vp-right, and chearing harts: the commandement of the Lord is bright, that giveth light to the eyes, &c. Again: A lanterne to my feete is thy word, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all thine Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherem is the need, not what vse the Law ministereth to the regenerate, but what it is able to giue to man of it selfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with howe great profite the Lorde doth instruct them by reading of his Lawe, to whome he inwardly inspirith a readinesse to obey.
 And he taketh hold not of the commandements onely, but also the promise of grace annexed to the things which onely maketh the bitterness to waxe sweete. For what were lesse amiable than the Law, if it should onely with requiring and threatning trouble soules carefully with feare, and vex them with terror? But specially Dauid sheweth, that he in the Law conceiued the Mediatour, without whome there is no delite or sweetenesse.

The Law because it ingēdredh death is not therefore to be shaken off, but must be followed as a rule which serueth to direct all the actions of our life.
Deut. 31. 6.

13 Which while some vnskillfull men cannot discern, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bidde the two tables of the Law farewell, because they thinke it is not greetable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that containeth the ministracion of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same Law which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to haue a better and more excellent vie. For thus, when he was readie to die, he openly saide to the people: Lay your hartes vpon all the words that I doe testifie to you this day, that ye may commit them to your children, that ye may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfill all the things that are written in the volume of this Law, because they are not vainly commanded you, but that eury one should liue in them. But if no man can denie that there appeareth in it an absolute paterne of rightcoufnesse, then either we must haue no rule at all to liue iustly and vprightly, or else it is not lawfull for vs to depart from it. For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the Lawe, let vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the end of the world: and let vs not therefore be frayed away, or flie from being instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exact holynesse than we shall performe, while we shall carry about the perfon of our body. For now it executeth not against vs the office of a rigoros exacter that will not be satisfied, but with his full taske performed: but in this perfection whereunto it exhorteth vs, it sheweth vs a marke, toward which in all our life to endeuor, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our ductie. In which endeuour if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that marke, toward which our endeuours doe trauaile a faire off.

Psal. 1. 2.

The abrogating of the Law of God, is the faithfull is their deliuering from the curse shrouned in the Law, not from the miserie of continue all endeuoring to fulfill that which the Law requireth.

14 Now therefore, whereas the Law hath toward the faithfull a power to exhort, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curse, but such as with often calling on, may shake off sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expresse this deliuerance from the curse thereof, doe say, that the Law is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yet of the Law morall) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by making afraide and confounding their consciences, damne and destroy them. And truly such an abrogation of the Lawe, Paul doth plainly teach, and also that the Lord himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this that he would not haue confuted that opinion that hee should dissolue the Law, vnlesse it had bene commonly receued among the Iewes. But forasmuch as it could not rise causelessly and without any colour, it is likely that it grew vpon false vnderstanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errors are wont to take occasion of truth, but least we should also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the Lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroy the Law but to fulfill it: and that till heauen and earth passe away, no one iote of the Law should passe away, but that all should be fulfilld: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the Law. And for good cause: sith he came rather for this ende, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the Law remaineth for all Christians, inuolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebulking rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to every good worke.

Mat. 5. 17.

15 As for those things that Paul speaketh of the curse, it is euident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the Law not onely teacheth, but also with authoritie requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yea if due care be slackt in any part, it bendeth hir thunderbolt of curse. For this cause the Apostle saith, that all they that are of the workes of the Law, are subiect to the curse, because it is written: Cursed is euerie one, that fulfilleth not all. And he saith, that they be vnder the workes of the Law, that doe not set righteousness in the forgouenesse of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigour of the Law. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bonds of the Lawe, vnlesse we will miserably perishe vnder them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and sharpe exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the Law, and suffreth not any offence vnpunished. From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeeme vs, he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Cursed is euerie one that hangeth vpon the tree. In the chapter following in deed he saith, that Christ was made subiect to the Lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the Lawe, but all in one meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption wee might receiue the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshaken, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authoritie of the Law, but that it ought still to be receiued of vs with the same reuerence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which we abrogate not in effect, but in vse onely. And this, that Christ by his coming hath made an ende of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should haue giuen but a vaine shew to the people, vnlesse the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had bene shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discern to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to proue that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore how in the abolishing of them, the truth shineth better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile spread before, shew a figure of Christ that had already plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces and fell downe: because now the true and expresse image of the heauenly good things was come to light, which before had bene but vnperfectly begun with darke rude draughtes, as the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith. Hereunto serueth that saying of Christ, that the Law and the Prophets were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forwarde, the kingdome of God began to be ioyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of saluation, and of eternall life, but because a farre off, and vnder shadowes onely they did beholde that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behooued that the Church of God should climbe vp higher from those first instructions, Iohn the Baptist declareth, for that the Law is giuen by Moses, but grace and truth began by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truly promised in the olde sacrifices, and the Arke of the couenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauour of God, yet all this had bene but a shadowe, if it had not bene grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is found, perfect and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall vsages of the Law haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the ende of them it is the better known how great was the profit of them before Christs coming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

The bonds of the law from which we are loosed are those exacting, the rigor and extremitie whereof, if it were not mitigated would cause despayre, and not those instructions of obedience, the authority whereof doth and must stand in force for euer.

17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noteth. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgiuing you all your offences, blotting out the handwriting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrarie vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse, &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the lawe somewhat further that now we haue nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expound it of the lawe morall whose vnappeaseable rigor rather then doctrine therof they thinke to be taken away. Some more deeply waying the wordes of Paul, do espie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremoniall, and do shewe that this word Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he sayeth thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh void the lawe of commandements consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Iewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherefore I graunt that those first expositors are rightfully reprooued by these: but yet mee thinkes that these do not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at al, to haue these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder; that was in ceremonies. For the vsages of washings & sacrifices, wherewith the Iewes were made holy vnto the Lord, do seuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a higher mysterie? In deed the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall obseruations wherunto the false Apostles did labour to driue the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galathians he searcheth that controuerse further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to call it a handwriting against vs? moreouer to set the whole sum in a manner of our redemption in this, that it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it selfe trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trust that I haue attained the naturall vnderstanding of it if at least this be graunted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine wordes of the Apostle, that in the Iewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they else by sacrifices, but confesse themselves in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleansings in their place? What did they with their cleansings, but testifie themselves to be vncleane? And so was the handwriting of their sin & vncleannes oft renewed by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained vnder the olde testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily call the ceremonies handwritings against those that obserue them: for in such as by them they did openly seale to their owne damnation & vncleannes. And it hinders not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doth seuer from Christ, because being at that time vsed, they did obscure the glory of Christ. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselves, are well and fitly called handwritings against the saluation of men, because they were as solemn instruments that testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what point they should fall backe againe, if they suffered themselves in such sort to be yoked by them. For here withall was the benefite of Christ wrested away from them, in asmuch as he hauing once performed the eternall cleansing, hath vtterly abolished those dayly obseruations which were onely of force to seale finnes, but could doe nothing to the putting away of them.

The viij. Chapter.

An exposition of the Morall Law.

HERE I thinke it shall not be from the purpose, to enterlace the tenne Commandments of the Law with a short exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I haue touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then also we shall haue besides that a prooffe of the second point, that the Iewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlinesse, but also by the terrour of the iudgement, such they saw themselues vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they would or no, to be drawen to the Mediator. Now in setting foorth the summe of those things that are required in the true knowledge of God, we haue alreadie taught, that we cannot conceiue him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maiestie presenteth it selfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worship of him. In the knowledge of our selues we haue set this for the chiefe point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strength, and cleane stripped of the trust of our owne rightcoulnesse, and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with conscience of our owne needinesse, we should learne perfect humilitie and abasement of our selues. The Lord setteth foorth both these pointes in the Law, where first chalenging to himselfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reuerence of his diuine maiestie, and appointeth out vnto vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his rightcoulnesse, (against the rightcoulnesse whereof our nature as it is peruerse and crooked, doth alwaie stricke, and beneath the perfection wherof our power as of it selfe it is weake and feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reprooueth vs both of weaknesse and vnrighteousnes. Moreouer, that inward law which we haue before said to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the harts of all men, doth after a certaine manner enforme vs of the same things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conscience doth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witnesse and admonisher of those things that we owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and cull, and so acculeth vs when wee swarue from our duety. But man being wrapped in such darkenes of errors as he is, skarse euen slenderly tasteth by that law of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truly he is very farre distant from the right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancie and ambition, and so blinded with selfeloue, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, descend into himselfe to learne to submit and humble himselfe, and confesse his owne misery. Therefore (as it was necessarie both for our dulnes and stubborneesse) the Lord hath set vs a law written, which should both more certainly testifie that which in the Law naturall was too obscure, and also should shake away our drounsynesse, and more liuely touch our minde and remembrance.

2 Now it is easie to vnderstand what is to be learned of the Law, that is, that as God is our Creator, so of right he hath the place of our Father and Lord, and that by this reason we owe to him glorie, reuerence, loue, and feare. Yea, and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to followe whither soeuer that lust of our minde doth mooue vs, but that we ought to hang vpon his becke, and to rest onely vpon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that he delighteth in rightcoulnesse, that hee abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore that vnlesse we will with wicked

The worship due to God, and the unrighteousness which is in vs, because the inward Law naturally written in our harts cannot sufficiently reach, therefore God himselfe hath giuen a law which doth

By the law we understand that we owe God obedience and that he leueth righteousness which we must seeke after, not excusing our selves by our inabilitye which is no excuse.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of vnthankiulnes fall away from our creator, we must necessarily obserue righteoufnes all our life long. For if then onely we yeelde vnto him the reuerence that we owe, when we preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worship of him, but the obseruation of righteoufnes, holinesse and cleannesse. Neither may we pretende this excuse that we want power, and like wasted debtors be not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that we should measure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatsoeuer we be, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a louer of righteoufnesse, a hater of wickednesse. Whatsoeuer he requireth of vs (because he can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature we must of necessity obey: but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if we be holden bound of our owne lust wherein sinne reigneth, so that we are not loofe at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why we should alleage necessitie for our defence, the cuil whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our selues.

The law bringeth men by shipwrack to the haues.

3 When we haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the lawe, then must wee by the teaching of the same lawe also descende vnto our selues: whereby at length we may carrie away two things. The first is, by comparing the righteoufnesse of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to haue place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckened among his children. The second is, in cōsidering our strength, to learne that it is not only sufficient to fulfil the law, but also vterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a distrust of our owne strength, and a care and fearefulness of minde. For conscience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the iudgement of God is present before it: and the iudgement of God cannot be felt, but that it striketh into vs a dreadful horreur of death. And likewise being constrained with prooues of her owne weaknesse, it cannot choofe but by and by fall into dispaire of her owne strength. Both these afflictions do ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made a fraide with feeling of eternall death, which he seeth to hang ouer him by the deseruing of his owne righteoufnesse, turneth himselfe to the only mercie of God, as to the onely haue of saluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the law, despairing in himselfe, he may take breath againe and begin to craue and looke for helpe from elsewhere.

The vse of the promises and threatnings of the law.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reuerence of his righteoufnesse hath also added promises and threatnings to fill our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be moued with the onely beautie of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull Father of his tender kindnesse, to allure vs with sweetnesse of rewardes to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewardes laid vp for vertue, and that he shall not spend his labour in vaine, whoeuer he be, that shall obey his commandements. He proclaimeth on the other side, that he not only abhorreth vnrighteoufnes, but also that it shall not scape unpunished, for that he will be a reuenger of the contempt of his maistie, and to exhort vs by all meanes, he promiseth as well the blessings of this present life as also eternall blessednes to their obedience that keepe his commandements: and to the transgressors thereof, he threatneth both present miseries and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (he that doth these things shall liue in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the soule that sinneth, that same shall die) do without doubt belong to the immortalitie or death that is come, and shall neuer be ended. Albeit, wherefoeuer is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternall destruction. Of present blessings and curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penall ordinances appeereth the fouraigne cleannesse of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, besides his great loue of righteousnes, (which he cannot finde in his hart to defraude of her reward) there is also proued by his marvellous bountifullnes. For whereas we and all ours are indebted vnto his Maiestie, by good right whatsoeuer he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due debt, but the payment of debt is not woorthie of reward. Therefore he departeth with his own right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we do not yeeld of our selues as things that were not due: but what those promises doe bring vnto vs, is partly said alreadie, and partly shall appeere more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendations of righteousnes, that it may the more certainly appeere how much the keeping thereof pleaseth God: that the penall ordinances are let for the more detestation of vnrighteousnes, least the sinner delited with the sweete flattering of vices, should forget that the iudgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Now whereas the Lord giuing a rule of perfect righteousnes, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more readie to deuise now and then diuers sorts of worshipping to winne his fauour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, because it is naturally planted in the wit of man, hath hewed and yered them forth it selfe, that men do alway delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteousnes beside the word of God, whereby it cometh to passe that the commandments of the lawe haue but small place among the works that are commonly called good workes, while that innumerable rout of mens workes occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses than to restraine such licentiousnes, when after the publishing of the lawe he spake thus to the people: Giue heede, and heare all the things that I command thee, that it may be well to thee and to thy children after thee for euer, when thou shalt doe that which is good and pleasant before thy God. What I command thee, that onely do: adde not vnto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protested, that this was his wisdom and vnderstanding before other nations, that he had receiued iudgements, righteousnes, and ceremonies of the Lord, he said further, Keepe therefore thy selfe and thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes haue seene, and that at no time they fall out of thy hart. For, because God did foresee, that the Israelites would not rest, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beside it trauell in bringing forth new righteousnes, if they were not seuerely holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteousnes, which should haue been the strongest stie to holde them backe, and yet they did not cease from that boldnes so much forbidden them. But what of vs we are surely comprehended within the same charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his lawe the absolute doctrine of righteousnes, yet we not contented therewith, do monstrously trauele with forging and coining of newe good workes one vpon another. For the healing of this fault, the best remedie shall be, if this thought shall be stedfastly settled in vs, that the lawe is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteousnes: that therein is taught no righteousnes, but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of workes are vainly attempted to winne the fauour of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such studie of good workes as wandreth out of the lawe of God, is an intollerable desiling of Gods righteousnes and of the true righteousnes. Augustine also saith most truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometime the mother and keeper, sometime the original of all vertues.

6 But when we haue expounded the lawe of the Lorde, then more fitly and with more profit shall that be confirmed which I haue before spoken of the office and

God by making his will and prescription the onely rule of our obedience, excludeth all our own by inuentions of pleasing him as a pleasant and unacceptable.

vse of the law. But before that I begin to discourse every severall commandment by it selfe, it shall be good now to give such lessons as serve to the vniuersall knowledge thereof. First let vs hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the lawe not onely to outward honestie, but also to inward and spirituall righteousness. Which thing whereas no man can denie, yet there be few that rightly markeit. That cometh to passe, because they looke not vpon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weied. If any king doe by proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steale: in this case I grant that if a man doe onely conceiue in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steale, and do not commit any of these things in deede, hee is out of the compass of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortall lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuilitie: his commandments are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eie nothing escapeth), and (which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleannes of the hart) vnder the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, coueting of another mans, guile, and whatsoever is like to these. For inasmuch as he is a spiritual lawmaker, he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule, are wrath and hatred: the theefe of the soule, is euill desire and couetousnesse: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man say) haue regard to intents and wils, and not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intents and wils, as haue outwardly broken out. They wey with what intent euery outward act hath bene done, but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his hands fro offending. On the other side, because the heavenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of mindes is principally needfull to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, euen when they mightily dissemble their contempt of the law, do frame their eies, their feete, their hands, and all the parts of their bodies to some obseruation of the lawe, in the meane time they hold their hart most farre off from all obedience, & thinke themselves well discharged, if they keepe close from men that which they doe in the sight of God. They heare it said: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steale: they draw not out their sword to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their hands vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole harts they breath out murders, they boyle in lust, they cast their eies aside at all mens goods, and deuour them with coueting. Nowe wanteth that which was the chiefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, cometh so grosse dullnesse, but that leauing the lawmaker, they rather measure righteousness by their owne wit? Against these doth Paul mightily crie out, affirming that the law is spirituall, whereby he meaneth, that it not onely demandeth an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angeliike purenesse, which hauing all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may fauour nothing but of the spirit.

Rom. 7. 14.

This Christ sheweth by expounding the law, not by reaching a newe and another lawe perfecter and better as some perniciously imagine.
Mat. 5. 21.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the lawe, we thrust not in a new exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expositor of the lawe. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, hee reproveth this most perilous errour, and pronounced that vnchaste looking at a woman is fornication: hee protested that they are manslaughterers that hate their brother, for hee maketh them guiltie of iudgement that haue but conceiued wrath in their minde, and them guiltie of the council that in murmuring or grudging haue vttered any token of a displeas'd minde: and them guiltie of hell fire, that with taunts and railing breake forth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue fained Christ to be another Moses, the giuer of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection fection of the lawe of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospell, which farre passeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commaundements, it shall appeere by Moses himselfe, how reprochfull^y they dishonour the lawe of God. Truly it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocritic, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteousnesse. But it is very easie to confute that error: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the lawe, whereas he did but restore the lawe to her integrity, while he made it free, and cleansed it being obscured with lies, and defiled with lea-uen of the Pharisees.

8 Let this be our second note, that there is a way more contained in the commaundements and prohibitions, than is by wordes expressed, which yet is so to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentious wresting the Scriptures, wee may make of euery thing what we list. For many bring to passe by this vmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authoritie of Scripture groweth in contempt, and other some despaire of vnderstanding it. Therefore if it be possible, we must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path leade vs to the will of God, we must I say search how farre our exposition may exceede the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeere that it is not an addition of mens glosses knit to the wordes of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the lawegiuer is faithfully rendred. Truly in a manner in all the commaundements it is so manifest, that there are figuratiue speeches, meaning more in expressing part than he may woorthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober exposition doeth passe beyond the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth harde to iudge, vnlesse there be some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to be the best measure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commaundement, that is, that in euery commaundement be waied, why it was giuen vs. As for example: Euerie commaundement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truth of both sortes shall forthwith be founde, if we consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the ende of the fifth commaundement is, that honour is to be giuen to them to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commaundement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that wee honour them to whom hee hath giuen any excellencie, and that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the first commaundement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commaundement shall be, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worship of his maiestic pleaseth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euery commaundement we must looke vpon what matter it treateth: then must we search our the ende, till we finde what the lawemaker doeth testifie therein properly to please or displease him: and last of all must wee drawe an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this displease him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he command this, then he forbiddeth the contrarie: if he forbid this, then he commaundeth the contrarie.

9 That which is now somewhat darkly touched, shall in expounding of the commaundements become very plaine by practise, wherefore it sufficeth to haue touched it, sauing that this last point, is to be shortly confirmed with some prooffe thereof, because otherwise either it should not be vnderstanded, or being vnderstand, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to found like an absurditie. This needeth no prooffe, that when a good thing is commaunded, the euill is forbidden: that is contrarie to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it me. And common iudgement will not much sticke to admit, that when euill things are forbidden, the contrarie duties

The second rule to vnderstande the law by, is that in euery commaundement, more is meant than the naked words doe literally import, and how much more the scope of each commaundement compared with the matter thereof together with the contrarie will shew.

That the forbidding of euill in the lawe, implieth a commaunding of the contrarie duties which are good.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

are commaunded. It is an vniuersall opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrarie vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speech doe signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrarie to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrarie duties and doings. Therefore in this commaundement, Thou shalt not kill, the common sense of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to doe hurt. I say that there is further contained, that we should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I prouue it thus: God forbidde that our brother be hurt or misused, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deere and precious vnto vs: hee doth therefore require withall those duties of loue that may be done by vs for the preservation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commaundement doth alway disclose vnto vs all that we are therein commaunded or forbidden to doe.

The cause why God hath forbidden the very secret motion vnto sinne by the name of the grosse and actuall deede, is that the foulesse of such terms might make vs the better to vnderstand the vglinesse of those fautes, which being exprest by more proper and soft names, we would make lesse account of.

10 But why God, in such as it were halfe commaundements, hath by figures rather secretly signified, than exprest what his will was, whereas there are woont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me about the rest. Because the flesh alway endeouoreth to extenuate the filthinesse of sinne, and to colour it with faire pretences, sauing where it is euen palpable for grossenesse, he hath set forth for an example in every kinde of offence that which was most wicked and abhominable, at the hearing whereof our very senses might be moued with horror, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more hainous detesting of euerie sort of sinne. This many times deceiveth vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secrete, we make them seeme small. These deceites the Lord doth disclose, when he accustometh vs to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principall heads, which doe best of all shew, how much euery kinde is abhominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought so hainous euils, when they are called by their owne names, but when they are forbidden vs vnder the name of manslaughter, wee better vnderstand how abhominable they are before God, by whose worde they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and we moued by his iudgement, doe accustom our selues better to weigh the hainousnesse of those fautes that before seemed but light vnto vs.

Thereason of diuiding the law into two partes or tables, whereof the former containeth the duties which we owe properly vnto God, is for that his worship is the fountaine, head and foundation without which there can no good or acceptable dutie passe from man to man.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will iudge that there is sometime mention made not vnfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And we haue a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this matter. For God so deuided his law into two partes, in which is contained the whole rightousnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the duties of religion that doe peculiarly pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of Charitie which belong vnto men. The first foundation of rightousnes is the worship of God: which being once ouerthrown, all the other members of rightousnesse are torne in sunder and dissolved, like to the partes of an house vnioined and fallen downe. For what maner of rightousnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robbetrie and extorsions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoilest Gods maiestie of his glorie? that thou defilest not thy bodie with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou traucell to destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore rightousnesse is vainely boasted of without religion, and maketh no better shewe, than if a mangled bodie with the head cut off, should be brought forth for a beautifull sight. And religion is not onely the principall part of rightousnesse, but also the very soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie and loue among themselves without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteousnesse, because when it is taken away, all the equitie continence and temperance that men vse among themselves, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the springhead and lively breath of righteousnesse, because hereby men do learne to liue among themselves temperately and without hurt doing one to another, if they reuerence God as the iudge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth vs to godlinesse and the proper duties of religion, wherewith his maiestie is to be worshipped: in the other he presenteth how for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Euangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall points, the one that we shoulde loue God with all our hart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that we loue our neighbour as our selves. Thus thou seest how of the two parts wherein he concludeth the whole lawe, he directeth the one towarde God, and appointeth the other toward men.

Matth. 22. 27.
Luk. 10. 27.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principall points, yet to the ende to take away all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God to declare in the ten commandments more largely and plainly all things that belong both to the honor, feare and loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie which hee commaundeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commandments, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein euery man ought to haue his iudgement free, for which we ought not contentiously to strue with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, least the Readers should either scorne or maruell at the diuision that we shall vse, as new and lately deuided. That the law is deuided in ten wordes, because it is oft approoued by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controuersie, wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the manner of diuiding. They that so diuide them, that they giue three commandments to the first table, and put other seauen into the second, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it vnder the first: whereas without doubt it is feuerally set by the Lorde for a commandement, and the tenth commandement of not coueting the things of his neighbour, they do fondly teare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to vnderstande, that such manner of diuiding was vnknowne in the pure age. Other do reckon, as we do, foure feuerall commandments in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commandement. As for me, because vnlesse I be conuincid by euident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandments, me thinks I see so many diuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allow, that is, that the same which these later sort make the first commandement, shall be in steede of a preface to the whole law, and then shall follow the commandments, fouer of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shall be rehearsed. Augustine also to Basil agreeth with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God onely be serued with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before feuerally spoken of the shade with commandment of the Sabbath. In another place in decde that first diuision pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of thre commandments, the mysterie of the Trinitie more plainly appeereth. Albeit in the same place he sticketh not to confesse that otherwise hee rather lieth our diuision. Besides these, the author of the Vnperfect worke upon Matthew is of our side. Iosephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table five commandments. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charitie, and also is confuted by the authoritie of the Lord himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the commandement of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Now let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

That in the former table besides a general preface to the law, fouer commandments are contained, in the later table sixe.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the lande of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt haue no strange Gods before my face.

To keepe the lawe from growing into contempt the law-maker in the preface therunto vseth three meanes. the first is a declaration of his greatnes which to shewe he vermeth himselfe the Lord.

Rom. 11. 36.

The second, a manifestation of his loue towards them unto whom he gaue the law, signifying in gracious words that he had beaken himselfe to be wholly theirs.

Mal. 1. 6.

The third, a rehearsal of such a benefite as could not be vnto them that receiued it, an euerlasting bond of durifull obedience.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a part of the first commandement, or read it seuerally, it is indifferent vnto me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth in steed of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heed to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the maiestic of the law that he shall make, may neuer at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of arguments. First he lengtheneth to himselfe power and right of dominion, whereby hee may constrain his chosen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then he setteth foorth a promise of grace with sweetnesse thereof to allure them to studie of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefite that he did for them, to reprocue the Jewes of vnthankfulness, if they do not with obedience answer his kindnes. Vnder the name of Iehouah, the Lord, is ment his authoritie and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him, and do abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of gods maiesty, because it were monstrous for vs to seeke to withdrawe our selues from vnder his government, out of whom we cannot be.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to drawe by onely necessitie, he also allureth with sweetnes in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutuall relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. Whereupon Christ prooueth that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob haue immortall life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I haue chosen you to be my people, not onely to do you good in this present life, but also to giue you the blessednes of the life to come. But to what end this tenderth, it is noted in diuers places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchsafe to deale thus mercifully with vs, to cal vs into the companie of his people, he choiceth vs (saith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people vnto himselfe, a holy people, and should keepe his commandements. From whence also commeth this exhortation: Be yee holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is demed that protestation that is in the prophet: The sonne honoureth the father, and the seruant honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

15 Now followeth the rehearsal of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to moue vs, as the fault of vnthankfulness is more detestable euen among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse therof of being worthe to be had in remembrance for euer, should remaine in force with their posteritie. More ouer it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say that they were deliuered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, that they should with obedience and readines of seruicie honour him, the author of their deliuerance: Hee vseth also, (to the end to holde vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himselfe with certaine titles, whereby he maketh his sacred maiesty to be differently known from all idols and forged gods. For, as I saide before, such is our readie inclination to vanitie, ioyned with rash boldnes, that so soone as God is named, our mind cannot take heed to it selfe, but that it by and by falleth away to some vaine inuention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedie for this mischeefe, he setteth out his owne godhead with certaine titles and so doth compass vs in, as it were within certaine grates, least we shoulde wander hither and thither and rashly forge our selues some new God, if forsaking the liuing God, we should erect an idol. For this cause to oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they clothe him, and as it were inclose him, within those markes, whereby he had opened himselfe to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when he is set in the temple of Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these and like formes of speech doe not binde him to one place or to one people, but are set onely for this purpose, to stay the thoughtes of the godly in that God, which by his couenant, that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himselfe, that it is no way lawfull to varie from such a paterne. But let this remaine stedfastly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliuerance to this end, that the Iewes might the more cheerefully giue themselves to the God that doth by right claime them vnto him. And we (least we should thinke that the same nothing belongeth to vs,) ought to consider, that the bondage of Aegypt is a figure of the spirituall captiuitie, wherein we are all holden bounde, vntill our heavenly deliuerer doe make vs free by the power of his arme, and conuey vs into the kingdome of libertie. As therefore when in the olde time he minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intolerable dommon of Pharao, where with they were oppressed: so all those to whom at this day he professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliuer from the deadly power of the diuell, which was in a shadow signified by that corporal bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his minde ought to be inflamed to haiken to the lawe which he heareth to haue proceeded from the soveraigne King. From whome as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they haue also their ende appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say) but hee ought to be raiued to embrace the Lawemaker, to the keeping of whose commaundments, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortall life: by whose marvellous power and merite, he knoweth himselfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

16 After that he hath grounded and established the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commaundment, I haue no strange Gods before him. The end of this commaundment is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholly enjoy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may so be, he commaundeth that there be faime from vs all vngodlike and superstition, whereby the glorie of his godhead is either diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commaundeth, that we worship and honor him with true endeour of godlike. And the very simplicitie of the wordes themselves doe in a manner expresse the same. For we can not haue God, but we must also comprehend them all things that properly beioing to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we should not giue away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God bee innumerable, yet not vnto us they may be brought vnto foure principall points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioined spirituall obedience of conscience: Assistance, Inuocation and Thanksgiving. Adoration I call the reverence and worship which euery one of vs yeideth vnto him, when he submitteth himselfe vnto his greatnesse: wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part therof, that we yeild our confidences in subiection to his lawe. Assistance is an assistance of resting in him by reknowledging of his powers, when reposing all our wisdom, righteousnesse, power, rich and goodness in him, we thinke our selues blessed with only partaking of him. Inuocation, is a reuoluing of our minde

The first commaundment where no establish by sole preeminence ouer his people, be requirith that which is due, to be given him, and in no one, as adoration, assistance, inuocation, and thanksgiving: which we doe not yeild vnto him, or due vnto others with him, either in whole or in part, but in a reuoluing our hearts to behold it, but never in faith or secret.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

minde to his faith and helpe as to our onely succour, so oft as any necessitie presseth vs. Thankesgiuing is a certaine thankfulness whereby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God suffereth nothing to be conueyed away elsewhere, so he commaunded all to be wholly giuen to himselfe. Neither shall it bee ynough to abstaine from hauing any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy selfe in this, that many wicked contemners are woont, which thinke the readiest way, to to scorne all religions: but true religion must goe before, whereby our mindes may be directed to the liuing God, with knowledge whereof they being endued may aspire to reuerence, feare and worship his maiestie, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, euery where to seeke for his helpe, to reknowlege and aduance with confession of praise the magnificence of his workes, as to the onely marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swaruing from the true God, are drawn hither and thither as it were vnto diuers gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before saide, that all forged gods are to be driuen farre away, and that the worship is not to be torne in sunder, which hee alone claimech to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glorie, be it neuer so little, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The parcell of sentence that followeth (Before my face) increaseth the hainousnes: for that God is prouoked to ielousie, so oft as wee thrust our owne inuentions in his place, as if an vchaste woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eies should the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power and grace hee looked vpon the people that hee had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giueth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witnesse and beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is increased with much wickednes, that man thinketh that in his flyings away he can beguile the eies of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer wee purpose, whatsoeuer we goe about, whatsoeuer wee practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience be cleane euen from the most secrete thoughts of swaruing from him, if we will haue our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glorie of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not onely in ourwarde confession, but also in his eies, which doe behold the most secrete corners of hearts.

The second Commaundement.

Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heauen above or in earth beneath, or in the water vnder the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serue them.

The end of the second commaundement being to keep the worship of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddeth first to make any image for representation of God, and secondly to worship any image made.

17 As in the first commaundement he pronounced that he is the one God beside whom there are no other gods to be deuised or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kinde of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The ende therefore of this commaundement is, that hee will not haue the lawfull worship of him, to bee prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is woont to inuent, when it conceiueth God according to her owne grossenesse. And therefore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worship, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the grossest fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatrie. And there be two parts of this commaundement. The first restraineth our libertie, that we do not presume to make subject to our senses or by any form to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions sake. Moreouer he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, and peraduenture also birdes, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomie he meaneth as well birds as stars. Which note I would not haue spoken of but that I sawe some vnskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other parts, bicause they are sufficiently known of themselves. And we haue already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible formes of God man doth inuent, they are directly contrarie to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come forth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penall ordinance that followeth ought not a little to auaille to shake off our slouthfulnesse. For he threateth: That he is the Lorde our God, a strong and ielous God, that visiteth the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and sheweth mercie vnto thousandes to them that loue him and keepe his commandements. This is as much in effect, as if he should haue said, that it is he onely vpon whom we ought to sticke. And to bring vs therunto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contemned or diminished. Here is indeed set the name El, which signifyeth God. But bicause it is deuied of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfe ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he will be a reuenger of his maiestie and glory if any do transfer it to creatures or to grauen images, and that not with a thort or slender reuenge, but such as shall extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is such as shall be followers of their fathers vngodlines: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercie and bountifulnes vnto long continuance of posteritie, to those that loue him and keepe his law. It is a common maner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiueth vs into the bosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stand by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the duties of a faithfull and true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such loue and chastitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeeld not our soules to Satan, to lust, and to filthie desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whercupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throw away chastitie, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaste that he himselfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wiues minde incline to a strange louer: so the Lord that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in truth, testifieth that he hath a most feruently burning ielousie, so oft as neglecting the purenes of his holy marriage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transfer to any other, or do infect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to be most vncorrupted: For in much as by this meane we do not onely breake the faith giuen in wedlocke, but also so defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be seene what he meaneth by this, when he saith, that he will visite the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equitie of Gods iustice, to punish the innocent for an others offence, God himselfe also saith, that he will not make the sonne to beare the wickednesse of the Father. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sinnes of the ancestors vpon the generation to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that renderst the iniquitie of the fathers to the children, vnto the third and fourth generation. Likewise Hieremie: Thou that shewest mercie in thousandes, that

The penaltie annexed to the second commandment, which the better to imprint, God mentioneth his strength, his ielousie, his wont in showing both vengeance and mercie, not slightly but with long continuance as well of the one as the other: and the reason why God of himselfe as in the person of an husband.

Here 3. Oiee. 2. That by the punishment in which God doth threaten to the children of the disobedient for their fathers sin, that is ritual cause means whereby as the father being desistunt of the spere truth wickedly, so the sonne likewise for taking of God, followeth the same way to destruction. Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of renderest the iniquitie of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them. Manie, while they trauell much in loosing this knot, thinke that it is to be vnderstanded onely of temporall punishments, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurditie, for as much as they are oftentimes laide vpon them for their saluation, which is in deede true. For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonnes should be spoiled of the kingdome, and carried into exile for the sinne that he had committed. The houses of Pharao and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleaged for assoyling of this question, it is rather a thrust than a true exposition. For here and in like places he threateth a more greuous reuenge than it may be limitted within the boundes of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that the iust curse of the Lord, lieth not onely vpon the head of the wicked man himselfe, but also vpon his whole familie: when the curse once lieth vpon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, liue most wickedly, and the some likewise forsaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, do follow the same way of destruction: and finally the childes child, and the child of the childes child, the cursed seed of detestable men do fall headlong after them?

vnto that which the Prophet hath where he teacheth how childrens teeth are not set on edge by the sower grapes which their fathers haue eaten.
Eze. 18. 20.*

20 First let vs see, whether such reuenge be vnseemely for the iustice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth not to communicate his grace. Neuertheless they do perish by their owne vnrighteousnes, and not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarrell. Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to saluation as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laide vpon wicked men and euill doers for their offences, that their houses are deprived of the grace of God during manie generations: who can accuse God for this most iust reuenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, that the punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe ouer vnto the son. Note what is there intreated of. When the Isacelites had bene long and continually vexed with manie calamities, they began to vse for a Prouerb, that their fathers had eaten a sower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, wherof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deserving it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappealeable wrathfulness of God, than by a moderate seueritie. The Prophet pronounceth vnto them that it is not so: because they are punished for their own offences, and that it standeth not with the iustice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, wherof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other helpes of saluation: in this that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, do goe on in the steps of their fathers, they sustaine curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, and at last to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the iust iudgement of God, not for the sins of other, but for their own iniquitie.

*The promise of mercie towards them and theirs that feare God,

times out of kind,

the largeness of

Gen. 17. 7.
Pro. 20. 7.*

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercie of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemne covenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hauing respect vnto, writeth that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also not a little aualeth therunto, but also for that blessing promised in the covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon groweth great comfort to the faithfull, great terror to the wicked. For if euen after death, the remembrance both of righteouines and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posteritie, much more shall it light and rest vpon the heades of the dooers themselves. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times cometh to good prooffe, and the issue of the faithfull swarveth out of kinde: because the Lawmaker meant not here to stablish such a perpetuall rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terror of the sinner, that the penaltie is not vaine or of no effect, although it doe not alway take place. For as the temporall punishments that are laid vpon a few wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the iudgement that shall one day be giuen vpon all sinners, although many escape vnpunished euen to the end of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifullnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a prooffe of his constant and perpetuall fauour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednes of the father in the sonne, he sheweth what iudgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which assurednesse he had in this place principally respect vnto, And by the way hee commendeth vnto vs the largenesse of his mercie, which he extendeth vnto a thousand generations, whereas he assigned but onely foure generations to vengeance.

The third Commandement,

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

22 The end of this commandement is, that his will is to haue the maiestie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the summe shall be that we doe not defile it with contemptuously and irreuerently vsing it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that we take study and care godly to reuerence it. Therefore we ought to order ourselues both in our mindes and in our toonges, that we neither thinke nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but reuerently and with much sobriety: that in weying his workes, we conceiue nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behooueth vs not negligently to marke, that whatsoever our minde conceiueth of him, whatsoever our toong vttereth, it may fauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name. and finally may serue to aduance his magnificence. That we doe not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy worde and reuerend mysteries either to ambition, or to couetousnesse, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepe their honor and estimation among vs. Last of all, that we doe not carpe against or speake euill of his workes, as these wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully against them: but that what soeuer we reherse done by him, we report it with words of praise of his wisdom, righteousness and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is defiled with vaine and peruerse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right vse whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much euill in this rash readinesse to vse the name of God out of season, much more mischief is in this, if it be employed to euill vses, as they doe that make it to serue the superstitions of Necromancie, cruell execrations, vnlawfull coniurations, and other wicked enchantments. But swearing is chiefly mentioned in the commandement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby we may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandement giuen of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the truth and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he after-

The end of the third commandement is the holy estimation of Gods name which excludeth all conceits and speeches concerning him which are not according to his highnes: all irreuerent omng of his word, all carping at his workes: and if all rash, much more all impious abusing thereof.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of warde in the second table condemneth periuurie and false witnessse, whereby hurt is done to the fellowshipp of men: but it were in vaine to repeat it againe, if this commandement intreated of the ductie of charitie. And also the diuision of the Law it selfe requireth it, because as it is said, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his Law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his own right to himselfe, and defendeth the holiness of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

The honor which God requireth to be giuen to his name in othes.

Esay 49. 18.

Esay 65. 16.

Ier. 12. 16.

23 First is to be learned what is an oth. It is a taking of God to witnessse, to confirme the truth of that which we speake. For those cursed speeches that containe manifest reproches against God, are vnworthie to be reckened among othes. That such taking to witnessse, when it is rightly done, is a kinde of worshipping of God, is shewed in diuerse places of the Scripture. As when Esay prophecieth of the calling of the Assyrians and Aegyptians into fellowshipp of the covenant with Israel, They shall speake (saith he) in the toong of Canaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lord. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shall yeelde a confession of his religion. Againe, when he speaketh of the enlargement of his kingdom, he saith: Whosoeuer shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithfull: and he that shall sweare in the land shall sweare in the true God. Ieremie saith, if they shall teach the people to sweare in my name as they haue taught them to sweare by Baal, they shall be builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is said, that when we call vpon the name of the Lorde to witnessse, wee doe witnessse our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall and vnchangeable truth, whom we call vpon, not onely as a most substantiall witnessse of truth aboute all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knowr of harts. For where testimonies of men doe faile, there we flee to God for witnessse specially where any thing is to be prooued that lyeth secret in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angrie with them that sweare by strange Gods, and he iudgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue forsaken me, and doe swear by them that are no gods. And he declareth the hainousnesse of this offence by the threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of the Lord, and sweare by Melchidn.

Soph. 1. 5.

Periuurie, a profanation of the name of God.
Leu. 19. 12.

Iofua 7. 9.

24 Now then we vnderstand that it is the Lords will that there be in our othes a worshipping of his name: so much the more diligent heede is to be taken, that in steede of worshipping they doe not containe dishonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no small dishonor, when periuurie is committed in swearing by him, whereof it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lord when he is spoyled of his truth? he shall then cease to be God. But truly he is spoyled thereof, when he is made an affirmer and approouer of falshood. Wherefore, when Iofua minded to driue Achan to confesse the truth, he said: My Sonne, giue glory to the Lord of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lorde is grievously dishonored if a man sweare falsely by him. And no maruell. For we doe as much as in vs lyeth, in a manner to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speech was vsed among the Iewes so oft as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospell of Iohn. To this heedfulnessse the formes of othes that are vsed in the Scriptures doe instruct vs: The Lord lueth, The Lord doe these things vnto me, and adde these things, The Lord be witnessse vpon my soule. Which doe prooue, that we cannot call God for witnessse of our sayings, but that we also with him to take vengeance of our periuurie, if we speake deceitfully.

2. Cor. 1. 23.

The name of God abused when vsed
as a witness though

25 The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is vsed in superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also takē in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsely, vnklesse we doe also remember, that swearing

swearing was suffered and ordained not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull vse thereof, that apply it to things not necessary. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serue either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offende, and so much the more intolierably, for that by very custome it hath ceased to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the iudgement seare of God is not slenderly weyed. For euery where without regarde, the name of God is defiled in trifling talkes, and it is not thought that they doe cull, because by long suffered and vnpunished boldnesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednes. But the commandement of the Lorde remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall reuenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commandement is also transgressed in another point, that in our othes we put the holy seruants of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodlinesse, for so we transferre the glorie of his Godhead to them. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath giuen a speciall commandement to swaere by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not be heard swaere by any strange gods. And the Apostle euidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call vpon a higher than themselves, and that God which had none greater than his owne glory to swaere by, did swaere by himselfe.

Exo. 23. 13.

26 The Anabaptistes not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, swaere not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoeuer is more than this, is of euill. Bur by this meane, they doe without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduertarie to his Father, and as if hee had come downe from heauen to repeale his Fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the Law permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were enough: but also in necessitie doth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his Father: that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his Father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterward forbid and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let vs a little weigh them. But herein we shall neuer attaine the truth, vnlesse wee bend our eyes vnto the intent of Christ, and take heede vnto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or refraine the Law, but to reduce it to the true and naturall vnderstanding, which had bene very much depraued by the false gloses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we holde in minde, we shall not thinke that Christ did vtterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which doe transgresse the rule of the Law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no manner of swearing but perjuries, whereas the law doth not onely forbid perjuries, but also all idle and superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expositor of the Law, doth admonish them, that it is not onely euill to forswaere, but also to swaere. But how to swaere? in vaine. But as for these othes that are commended in the Lawe, he leaueth them safe and at libertie. They seeme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest hold of this word, At all, which yet is not referred to the word Swaere, but to the formes of swearing that are after rehearsed. For this was also part of their error, that when they did swaere by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence against this commandement, the Lord doth also cut off from them all by shutes that they should not thinke that they haue escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witness. For hereby by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect formes doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme or other tokens of Gods liberalitie towards them. Neither doeth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men fallyly thinke, but he rather consuteth their sophisticall suttlerie, which thought it no fault babblingly to throwe out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benefits. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deified that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the king: for then the false inaking of Gods doth obscure and minish the glorie of the one onely God. But when we meane onely, to procure credit to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his maiestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousnesse, all pretense of excuse, in this that he forbiddeth to sweare at all. And Iames to the same purpose, reciting the same wordes of Christ which I haue before alleaged, because the same rash boldnesse hath alwayes bene in the worlde, which is a prophane misusing of the name of GOD. For if yee refer this word, at all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare: wherefore serueth that exposition which is added afterwarde? Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those caullations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

Iac. 5. 12.

Note.

Othes not onely publicke but also private soberly & reuerently taken allowable and according both to reason and to approved examples.

27 Therefore it cannot nowe bee doubtfull to sounde iudgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprove those othes that were forbidden by the law. For hee himselfe which shewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that hee taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his disciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their master in all things, followed the same example: who dare say that Paul woulde haue sworne, if swearing had bene vtterly forbidden? but when the matter so required, he sware without any sticking at it, yea, sometime adding an execration. But this question is not yet ended, because some doe thinke that onely publicke othes are excepted out of this prohibition, as those othes that we take when the Magistrate doth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vse to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the Souldiar when he is put to an oath for his true seruice in the war, and such like. And to this sort they adioyne, and that rightfully, such othes as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Gospell, for as much as the Apostles in their office are not priuate men but publike ministers of God. And truly I denie not that those are the safest othes, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commanded in a doubtfull case to driue the witness to an oath, and he on the other side to answer by oathe: and the Apostle saith, that mens controuersies are by this meane ended. In this commaundement both these haue a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and we may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publicke and solemne oath was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were vsually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or verie little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the maiestie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemne private othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holily, and reuerently taken, which are maintained both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for priuate men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as iudge between them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witness. For the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endeourest to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and he by no means will suffer himselfe to be satisfied, If thy good oaths not to be taken

good name come in perill by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the iudgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocence knowne. Now if the weight of the words be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case we should affirme, that the calling him to witnesse is vnlawfull. And wee are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech be said not to serue for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Iacob and Laban were priuate men, which stablished a couenant with mutuall othe betweene themselves. Booz was a priuate man which by the same meane confirmed his promise of marriage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate man, a iust man and fearing God, which affirmed vnto Elias by oth, the thing that he meant to perswade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that othes be so tempered, that they be not vnadvised, that they be not common without regarde, that they be not vsed of raging lust, nor trifling, but that they serue iust necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Saboth day. Sixe daies shalt thou worke and doe all thy workes. But on the seuenth day is the Saboth of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt doe no worke, &c.

28 The ende of this Commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, should be liued in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordained. But because this Commandement hath a peculiar and seuerall consideration from the rest, therefore it must haue also a seuerall manner of exposition. The olde writers vse to call it a shadow with Commandement, for that it containeth the outward obseruation of the day, which by the coming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I graunt they say truly, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, wherupon this Commandement consisteth. For first the heavenly lawmaker meant vnder the rest of the seauenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spirituall rest, whereby the faithfull ought to cease from their owne workes, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondly, his will was to haue one appointed day, wherem they should meete together to heare the Law, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlines. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest graunted to seruants, and such as liued vnder the gouernement of other, wherem they might haue some ceasing from their labor.

Three causes considerable in the fourth commandement concerning the obseruation of the Saboth day.

29 But we are many waies taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principall point in the Saboth. For the Lorde required the keeping of no Commandement in a manner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is overthrowen, then he complaineth that his Sabbathes are polluted, defiled, not kept, nor sanctified: as though that pece of seruice being omitted, there remained no mo. e. wherem he might be honored. He did set footth the obseruing thereof with high praies. For which cause the faithfull did among other oracles manuelessly cheeme the reuiling of the Saboth. For in Nebuchad thus spake the Leuites in a solemne conuocation, Thou hast shewed to our fathers thy holy Saboth, and hast giuen them the Commandements and the ceremonies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commandments of the law. All which things do serue to set forth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very wel expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus, See that yee keepe my Sabbat day, because it is a token betweene mee and you in your generations: that you may know that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabbat and celebrate it in their generations, it is an euerlasting covenant betweene mee and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should know that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may work in vs: we must depart from our owne will, we must resigne vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our own wit, that we may haue God working in vs: that we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

Gods appointing the seventh day for the sabbath, and his ratifying the same, by his owne example, was to confirme the perfection of that euerlasting rest whereof the sabbath day being a figure is appointed on a day which following in orderly numerations beareth the name of a perfect number.

Esa. 66. 23.
1. Cor. 15. 28.

The principall thing in the sabbath is the mysterie of perpetuall rest: the ceremoniall use thereof abrogated, the superstitious obseruation to be avoided.

Esa. 8. 13.

30 This perpetuall ceassing was represented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be obserued with greater deuotion, the Lord commaunded with his owne example. For it auaieth not a litle to stirre vp mans endeour, that he may know that he tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifie euerlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of daies and nightes. There may be also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabbat should neuer be perfectly ended, til it cam to the last day. For in it we begin our blessed rest, in it we do daily proceede in profiting more and more. But because we haue still a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntill that saying of Esaie be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of newe Moone with new moone, of Sabbat with Sabbat, euen then when God shall be in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the seventh day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbat at the last day, that our whole life might by continuall meditation of the Sabbat, aspire to this perfection.

31 If any man mislike this obseruation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordained one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the lawe be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spirituall rest: And that he assigned the seventh day, either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting forth the likeness of his own example, he might the better mooue the people to keepe it or at least to put them in mind, that the Sabbat tended to no other end, but that they should become like vnto their creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysterie remaine which is therein principally set forth, concerning the perpetuall rest of our workes, to consideration whereof the Prophets did now and then call backe the Iewes that they should not thinke themselves discharged by carnall taking of their rest. Beside the places already alleaged, you haue thus in Esaie: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbat, that thou do not thine owne will in my holy day, and shall call the Sabbat delicate and holy of the glorious Lord, and shalt glorifie him while thou doest not thine owne waies, and seekest not thine owne wil to speake the worde, then shalt thou be delited in the Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures do vanish away, he is the bodie at sight whereof the the shadowes are left, he, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbath, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbath was a shadow of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, vntill that we being vterly dead to our selues, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious obseruing of daies ought to be farre from Christians.

Col. 2. 16, & 17.

32 But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to be reckoned among the old shadowes, but do belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbath is abrogate, yet this hath still place with vs, that wee should meete at appointed daies to the hearing of the word, and to the breaking of the mysticall bread, and to publike praier: and then that to seruants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commanding the Sabbath, the Lord had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely vse of the Iewes to prooue it. The second, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man seruant and thy maide seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Ægypt. Againe, in Exodus: that thy Ox and thy Ass may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can denie that both these things do serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meettings at the Church, are commended vs by the worde of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knownen in the verie experiance of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed and haue their ordinarie daies, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it off, that comelinesse and order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ranc of the Church, if it be dissolved. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releefe whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to provide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt saie, why doe we not rather daily meete together, that the difference of daies may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truly spirituall wisdome was a thing woorthy to haue daily a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot bee obtained of the weaknes of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see laide vpon vs by the will of God?

Although the first vse of the Sabbath which was to signifie spirituall rest being ceremoniall be done among, yet the second and thirde, whereby it was appointed for the people of God to meete and for labourers to cease on each sabbath remaine.

1. Cor. 14. 40.

33 I am compelled heere to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirits do raise trouble, concerning the Sunday. They crye out that the Christian people are nourished in Iewishnesse, because they keepe some obseuation of daies. But I answer, that we keepe those daies without any Iewishnesse, because we doe in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For we keepe it not with fraite religion as a ceremonie, wherein we thinke a spirituall mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessaie remedy to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be iudged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galathians, because they did still obserue daies. And to the Romanes he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betweene day and day. But who, sauing these madde men onely doth not see, of what obseruing the Apostle meaneth? For they had no regard to this politicall end and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them still as shadowes of spirituall things, they did euen so much darken the glorie of Christ and the light of the Gospell. They did not therefore cease from handie works, because they were things that did call them away from holy holy studies and meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from worke they did dreame that they still kept their mysteries of old time deliuered them. The Apostle, I saie, inuiceth against this disordered difference of daies, and not against the lawfull choise of daies that serueth for the quietnesse of Chriſtian fellowſhip: for in the Churches that he himſelfe did ordaine, the Sabbath was kept to this vse. For he appointeth the Corinthians the same day, wherein they should gather the collection to relieue the brethren at Ierusalem. If they feare superstition, there was more danger thereof in the feast daies of the Iewes, than in the Sundaies that the Christians now haue. For so as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of superstition, the day that the Iewes religiously obserued is taken away: and, so as was necessarie for keeping of comlineſſe, order, and quiet in the Church, another day was appointed for the same vse.

1. Cor. 16. 2.

NOTE -

The blamelesse intent of Christians, substituting the Sunday in ſte d of the Iewes Saboth, & of others among Christians hauing other festiual daies appointed for the same purposes: the principall exercises whereby the Sabbath is sanctified: their wishing vanitie which see no difference between Iewes and Christians but the change of the day when in the vse of the day indeed is principally differ.
Hilt. tripl. 9. cap. 38.

34 Albeit the old fathers haue not without reason of their choise, put in place of the Sabbath day, the day that we call Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the Lorde is the end and fulfilling of that rest, whereof the old Sabbath was a shadow: the Christians are by the verie same day that made an end of shadows, put in mind that they should no longer stick vnto the shadowish ceremonie. But yet I doe not so rest vpon the number of seauen, that I would binde the Church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that haue other solemne daies for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applied to the obseruation of Discipline and well appointed order. Let the sum hereof be this: as the truth was giuen to the Iewes vnder a figure, so is it deliuered vs without any shadowes at all. First, that in all our life long we should be in meditation of a continuall Sabbath or rest from our owne workes, that the Lorde may worke in vs by his spirit: then that euery man priuately so oft as he hath leisure, should diligently exercise himselfe in godly calling to minde the workes of God, and also, that we all should keepe the lawfull order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the worde, for the ministracion of the Sacraments and for publike praier: thirdlie, that we should not vngently oppresse them that be vnder vs. And so do the triflings of the false prophets vaniſh away that in the ages past haue infected the people with a Iewish opinion, that so much as was ceremoniall in this commandement is taken away, which they in their tooong call the appointing of the seuenth day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproch of the Iewes to change the day, and to keepe still the same holincesse in their minde. For there still remaineth with vs the like signification of mysterie in the daies as was among the Iewes. And truly we see what good they haue done by such doctrine. For they that cleaue to their constitutions, do by these as much exceed as the Iewes in grosse and carnall superstition of Sabbath: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, do no lesse fully serue for them at these daies, than for those that the Prophet reprooued in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that least religion should fall away or waxe faint among vs, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outward helps are to be vsed that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God.

Esay. 1. 13. & 58.

The fifth Commandment.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou maist liue long vpon the lande which the Lord thy God shall giue thee.

The end of the fifth commandment is preferuacion of order for which

35 The end of this commandment is, that because the Lord delieth in the preferuacion of his order, therefore he willet that those degrees of preeminence which he hath ordeined be not broken, the summe therefore shall bee that we reuerence those those whom the Lord hath set ouer vs, that we yeeld to them honour, obedience and thankfulness. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden vs, to withdraw any thing from their dignity, either by contempt or obstinacie or vnthankfulness. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie verie largely: as when the Apostle sayeth, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not onely that reuerence is due vnto them, but also such recompence as their ministerie deserueth. And because this commaundement of subiection, doeth most of all disagree with the puerfenesse of mans nature, which as it sweileth with greedinesse of climbing high, so it hardly abideth to be brought lowe: therefore he hath set that kind of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable and least enuious: because he might the easilier meeken and reclaime our mindes to the vse of submission. Therefore the Lord doth by litle and litle traine vs to all lawfull subiection by that which is most easie to beare, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom he giueth any preeminence, he doth communicate his owne name with them, so farre as is necessarie to preseue the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, do so belong vnto him alone, that so oft as we heare one of them named, our minde must needes be touched with a feeling of his maiestie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these things, he maketh to glister with a certaine sparke of his brightnesse, that they may be honorable euery one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we haue to consider somewhat of the nature of God, because he beareth not the name of God without cause. He that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

36 Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a generall rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinance set ouer vs, so we yeeld vnto him reuerence, obedience, thankfulness, and such other duties as it lieth in vs to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or vnworthie. For of what sort soeuer they be, they haue not without the prouidence of God attained that place, by reason whereof the lawmaker would haue them to be honored. Yet namely he hath giuen commaundement of reuerence to parents, that haue brought vs into this life, to which reuerence very nature ought in a manner to instruct vs. For they are monsters and not men, that breake the authoritie of parents with dishonour or stubbornnesse. Therefore the Lord commaunded all the disobedient to their parents, to be slaine, as men vnworthie to enioy the benefite of light, that do not reknowledge by whose meanes they came into it. And by manie aditions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reuerence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lord establisheth when he commaundeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The second he confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the fifteenth of Matthew, that it is the commaundement of God that we do good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commaundement, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in mind, how acceptable vnto God is the submission that is here commanded. For Paule vseth the same pricke to stirre vp our dulnesse when he saith: that this is the first commaundement with promise. For the promise that went before in the first Table, was not special and properly belonging to one commaundement, but extended to the whole lawe. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the land which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of land was a pledge of Gods bountifulnes: let vs not marueile if it pleased God to declare his fauor by giuing length of life, by which a man might long

God commaundeth all things belonging to the honor, and forbiddeth any thing tending to the dishonor of superiors in whom he becauseth with amiable names to meaken the mindes of men vnto obedience in subiection vnder them.

What is meant by the promise annexed to the first commaundement, and how it may stande with the strictnes of their lawe that are most obedient.

enjoy his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus: Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou maiest enjoy the possession of that lande that shall be vnto thee for a testimonie of my fauour. But sith all the earth is blessed to the faithful, we doe worthily reckon this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doth likewise belong vnto vs, forso much as the continuance of this life is a prooffe of Gods good will. For it neither is promised to vs, nor was promised to the Iewes, as though it contained blessednesse in it selfe, but because it is woont to be to the godlie a token of Gods tender loue. Therefore if it chauce that an obedient childe to his parents be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seene, yet doth God no lesse constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should rewarde him with a hundred Acres of land, to whome he promised but one Acre. All consisteth in this, that we should consider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blessing of God, and that it is his blessing so farre as it is a prooffe of his fauour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnesse and shew in effect to his seruants.

The curses that fall upon the disobedient, in which number are all that withdrawe their subiection from them to whom they owe all submission in the Lord, but no otherwise in the Lord.

38 Moreover, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reuerence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse hangeth ouer the stubborne and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: hee pronounceth them by his lawe subiect to the iudgement of death, and commaundeth them to be put to execution: and if they escape that iudgement, he himselfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see how great a number of that sort of men are flaine in battels and in fraies, and some other tormented in strange vncustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a prooffe that this threatening is not vaine. But if any escape to olde age, sith in this life being deprived of the blessing of God, they doe nothing but miserably languish, and are reserved for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children. But this is also by the way to be noted, that we are not commanded to obey them but in the Lord. And that is euiden by the foundation before laied: for they sit on high in that place whereunto the Lord hath aduanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is vsed towards them, ought to be a step towards the honouring of that soveraigne Father. Wherefore if they moue vs to transgresse the lawe, then are they woorthily not to be accounted parents, but strangers that labour to withdraw vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lordes, and all sortes of superiours. For it is shamefull and against conuenience of reason, that their preeminence shoulde preuaile to presse downe his highnesse, sith theirs as it hangeth wholly vpon it, so ought onelie to guide vs vnto it.

The sixth Commandement

Thou shalt not kill.

The sixth commandement tending to the vntie & thereby to the safetie of all mankind, doth vnder the name of murder both forbid all hurt & enioyn all furtherance which may growe from man to man:

39 The end of this commandement is, that forasmuch as God hath bound together all mankind with a certeine vnicie, that euery man ought to regard the safetie of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge, in summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours bodie may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our trauaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfullie employ the same, that we procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurt, & if they be in any danger, that we giue them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so saith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a sonde thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughts of the heart, and principally resteth vpon them, shoulde instruct nothing but the bodie to true rightcouinesse. Therefore the manslaughter of the hart is also forbidden in this law, and an inward affection to preferre our brothers life is here giuen in commandement. The hande in deede bringeth foorth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiuet it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Lookewhether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without burning in desire to do him hurt. If thou canst not be angrie with him, then canst thou not hate him, forasmuch as hatred is nothing but an old rooted anger. Although thou dissembel and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt still dallie out with shifts to defend it, it is already pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghost, that he is a manslayer that hateth his brother in his hart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Christ, that he is guiltie of iudgement that is angrie with his brother: that he is guiltie of the councill that saith Rhacha: that he is guiltie of hell fire, that saith vnto him, Foole.

which rule must be idle and direct not only our inward deeds, but also inward thoughts.

1. Iohn. 5.

Matth. 5. 22.

40 The Scripture noteth two points of equitie, vpon which this commandement is grounded: because man is both the image of God and our owne flesh, wherefore vnlesse we will defile the image of God, we must haue care to touch man none otherwise, than as a sacred thing: and vnlesse we will put off all naturalnes of man, we must cherish him as our owne flesh. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Christ, shall be intreated of in another place. God willed these two things naturally to be considered in man, that might perswade vs to the preservation of him, that we should both reuerence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our owne flesh. Hee hath not therefore escaped the crime of manslaughter, that hath kept himselfe from shedding of blood. If thou commit any thing indeed, if thou go about any thing with endeavour, if thou conceiue any thing in desire and purpose that is against the safetie of another, thou art holden guiltie of manslaughter. And againe: If thou do not trauell to thy power and as occasion may serue to defend his life, thou dost with like hainoufnes offend the law. But if there be so much care taken for the safetie of his bodie, let vs hereby gather, how much studie and trauaile is due to the safetie of his soule, which in the Lords sight doth infinitely excell the bodie.

Two speciall grounds of this commandement, the excellency of mans creation, and the price of his redemption, is regard of which two, if so much care be due to his bodie, is his soule bove much more.

The seventh Commandement.

Thou shalt not commit adulterie.

41 The end of the commandement is, that because God loueth chastitie and cleanness, therefore all vnclennesse ought to depart farre away from vs. The sin therefore shall be, that we be defiled with no vnclennesse or lustrull intemperance of the flesh. Whereunto answereth the affirmatiue commandement, that we chastlie and continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbideth by name, to which all vnchaste lust tendeth: that by the filthinesse of that which is more grosse and sensible, for so much as it also defileth the bodie, he might bring vs to abhorre all filthy lust. Sith man was created in this estate, not to liue a solitary life, but to vie a helper ioyned vnto him: and since that by the curse of sinne he is driuen the more to this necessitie, the Lorde hath in this behalfe provided helpe for him so much as was sufficient, when he ordained marriage, when he sanctified with his blessing the fellowship begunne by his authoritie. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowship of man and woman out of marriage, is accursed before him, and that the fellowship of marriage it selfe, was ordained for remedie of necessitie, that we shoulde

In the seventh commandement chastity and cleanness being sought, God by the name of a speciall intemperance, doth make barefull whatsoeuer is desired therein, and require a care of continuing our bodies and soules in pure for preservation whereof marriage is established.

not run out into vnbrideled lust. Therefore let vs not flatter our selues, sith we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of marriage, without the curse of God.

To whom the gift of continencie is not giuen, they must vse the remedie which God hath ordained.

42 Now forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more enkindled since the fall of man, we are become doubly subiect to desire of companie of women, except it be those whom God of his singular grace hath exempted from it: let euery man looke well what is giuen vnto him. Virginitie, I grant, is a vertue not to be despised: but sith it is to some denied, and to some graunted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and struiuing with it, cannot get the vpper hand, resort to the helpe of marriage, that so they may keepe chastitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceiue this worde, if they doe not succour their owne intemperance with the remedie that is offred and graunted them, they strue against God and resist his ordinance. And let no man carpe against me (as manie do at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can do all things. For the helpe of God is present onely with those, that walke in his waies, that is in their vocation from which they do withdraw themselues, which forsaking the helpes of god, do trauaile to ouercome and maister their necessitie with vaine rash boldnesse. The Lord affirmeth that continencie is a singular gift of God, and of that sort that are not giuen generally, nor vniuersally to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he saith, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of heauen, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely applie themselues to the affaires of the heauenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a litle before, that all men are not able to receiue it, but they to whom it is peculiarly giuen from heauen, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that euery man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, and another thus.

Psal. 19. 1. & 14.

Mat. 19. 12.

1. Cor. 7. 7.

They sinne grievously against god which vse it not although they keep themselues unstained with anie bodily vncleane acts.

43 Whereas wee are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in euery mans power to keepe chastitie in single life, although with studie and trauaile he endeavour neuer so much vnto it, and that it is a peculiar grace, which God giueth but to certaine men, that hee may haue them the more readieto his worke: doe wee not strue against God and nature which he hath institute, if we doe not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Heere the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleanness and chastitie of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way, that euery man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despise marriage as a thing vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise desire single life, vnlesse he be able to liue without a wife. And therein also let him not provide onely for the quiet and commoditie of the flesh, but onely that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readines and prepared to al duties of godlines. And forasmuch as this benefite is giuen to many but for a time, let euery man so long abstaine from marriage as hee shall be meete to lue to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now laid vpon him a necessitie to marrie. This the Apostle sheweth when he commandeth that to auoide fornication euery man haue his owne wife, and euery woman haue her owne husband, that he that cannot lue continently should marrie in the Lord. First he declareth that the most part of men are subiect to the vice of incontinencie: and then of those that be subiect vnto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth all to that onelic remedie, wherewith vnchastitie is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to helpe their infirmitie by this meane, they sinne euen in this that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vnchastitie, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastitie to be a cleanness of the minde, ioyned with chastitie of the body. A woman vnmarried

1. Cor. 6. 24.

(saith)

(saith he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as he is holy both in bodie and in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commandement, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but he saith, that it is better to marrie than to burne.

44 Now if married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust. For though the honestie of mariage do couer the filthines of incontinencie, yet it ought not forthwith to be a prouocation thereof. Wherefore let not married folkes thinke, that all things are lawfull vnto them, but let euery husband haue his owne wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them commit nothing vnto the honestie and temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure and modestie, and not to overflow into euery kind of extreame lasciuiousnes. This wantonnes Ambrose reprobued with a saying verie sore in decede, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth the husband the adulterer of his owne wife, which in vse of wedlock hath no care of shamefastnes or honestie. Last of all, let vs consider what lawmaker doeth here condemne fornication, euen he which sith of his owne right he ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth purenesse of the soule, spirit and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with vncleanly gestures, and with filthie talke to laye wait to trap anothers chastitie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboute measure wantonly and deintily clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchast, if we haue a regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthinesse in whatsoeuer part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out-of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastitie. If the Lord require chastitie of vs, then he condemneth all that euer is against it. Therefore if thou couet to shew obedience, neither let thy mind burue inwardly with cuill lust, nor let thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthie talke entise thy munde to like thoughts, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blot, wherewith the purenesse of chastitie is bespotted.

Marriage to be vsed as an holy remedie against euill not as a coiers of dissolute lust, all actes, causes and signes whereof must be avoided, as thought, looke, raiment, speech, discommodities.

The eight Commaundement.

Thou shalt not steale.

45 The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, that euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The summe therefore shall be, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goodes, and that therefore we are commaunded euery man to employ his faithfull trauaile to preferre to each man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke that what euery man possieth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the soueraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by cuill meanes, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of thefts there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goodes of one other are by any maner of force and robbing licentiousnesse bereaued. The other kinde consisteth in malicious deceite, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other sort there is that standeth in a more hidden suttletie, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other sort in flatterie, where they are sucked awy by pretence of gift. But least we should tarie too long vpon renting of all the feuerall kindes of theft, let vs knowe, that all craftie meanes whereby the possessions and money of our neighbours

That euery man may haue his owne, we are in the eighth commandement forbidden all practicing whatsoeuer is to the vnjust losse and danger of others, and all withholding of anie duty whereby we are bounde to doe them good, for as much as either of these doeth make vs guilty of theft.

neighbours are conueyed vnto vs, when they once goe by crooked waies from sincerenesse of hart, to a desire to beguile, or by any meane to doe hurt, are to be accounted for thestes. Although by pleading the lawe, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwise weigh them. For he seeth the long captiuous futilities, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simpler minde, till at length he drawe him into his nets. He seeth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth downe the weaker. He seeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh thee vnto. All which things are hidden from the iudgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in money, in wares, or in lands, but in euery mans right. For we defraude our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those duties which we are bound to doe for him. If any idle Factor or Baylife doe deuoure his masters substance, and is not heede-full to the care of his thrift, if he either doe wrongfully spoile, or doe riotously waste the substance committed vnto him, if a seruant doe mocke his master, if he disclose his secrets by any means, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe, if the Lord doe cruelly oppresse his hould, they are before God guilty of thest. For he both withholdeth and conueyeth another mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

The duties of all sorts of men for performance of the lawe.

46 We shall therefore rightly obey this commaundment, if being contented with our own estate, we seeke to get no guine but honest and lawful, if we couet not to waxe rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighbour of his goodes that our owne substance may encrease, if we labour not to heape vp cruell riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we doe not immeasurably scrape together euery way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigalitie satisfied. But on the other side, let this be our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsell and helpe to keepe their owne so fare as we may: but if we haue to doe with falsie and deceitfull men, let vs rather be ready to yeelde vp some of our owne, then to striue with them. And not that onely, but let vs communicate to their necessities, and with our store releue their neede, whome wee see to bee oppressed with hard and poore estate. Finally, let every man looke how much he is by duetic bound vnto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people haue in honour all those that are set ouer them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commaundments, refuse nothing that they may beare, stil keeping God fauourable vnto them. Againe, let them take care of their people, preferre common peace, defend the good, reframe the euill, and so order all things, as readie to giue account of their offic to the soueraigne iudge. Let the ministers of Churches faithfully apply their ministrerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of saluation, but deliuer it pure and synccre to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be ouer them, as good shepherdes be ouer the sheepe. Let the people likewise receive them for the messengers and Apostles of God, giue them that honor whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and inuise vnto them such things as are necessarie for their life. Let parents take on them to feede, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and grieue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish and imbrace them with such lenitie and tendernesse, as becometh their person. After which manner, we haue already saide, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let young men reuerence olde age, euen as the Lord willed that age to be honorable, Let old men also gouerne the weaknes of youth with their wisdom and experience, wherein they excell young men, not rating with rough and loude brawling, but tempering seueritie with mildnesse and gentlenesse. Let seruants shew themselves diligent and seruiceable to obey: and that not to the eie, but from the hart, as seruing God himselfe. Also let masters shewe themselves not

cessitie and hard to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpnesse, nor reprochfully vse them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow seruants vnder the heaucnly Lord, whom they ought mutually to loue and gently to intreat. After this manner, I say, let euerie man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreouer, our minde ought alwaies to haue respect to the lawmaker, that we may know that this lawe is made as well for our minds, as for our hands, that men should studie to defend and further the commodities and profit of other.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou shalt not be a lying witnes against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commandement is, that because God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to obserue truth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall be, that we neither hurt any mans name either with slaunders or false reportes, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that we offend no man, by lust to speake euill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is ioyned a commandement, that so farre as we may, we employ our faithfull endeuour for euerie man in affirming the truth, to defend the safetie both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expounde the meaning of his commandement in the three and twentie Chapter of Exodus, in these wordes: Thou shalt not vse the voice of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hande to speake false witnes for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in another place he doth not only call vs away from lying in this point that we be no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceiue his brother, for he forbiddeth them both in severall commandements. Truly it is no doubt, but that as in the commandements before, he hath forbidden crueltie, vnchastitie and couetounesse, so in this he restraineth falshood. Whereof there are two partes as we haue noted before. For either we offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backbite, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be vnderstanded solempne and iudiciall testimonie, or common testimonie that is vsed in priuate talks. For we must alwaies haue recourse to this principle, that of all the general kinds of vices one special sort is set for an example, whereunto the rest may be referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the fault is most apparant. Albeit, it were conuenient to extende it more generally to slaunders and sinister backbitings wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully grieued, for that falshood of witnesing which is vsed in iudiciall courtes, is neuer without perurie. But peruries in so much as they do prophane and defile the name of God, are already sufficiently met withal in the third commandement. Wherefore the right vse of this commandement is, that our tooing in affirming the truth, do serue both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name be more precious than any treasures, whatsoeuer they be: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoiled of the goodnes of his name than of his goods. And in bereauing his substance sometime false witnes doth as much as violence of hands.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent carelessnesse men doe commonly offende in this point, so that there are founde verie few that are not notably sicke of this disease: we are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweetnesse both in searching out and in disclosing the euils of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lie not. For he that forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willett also that it be preferred vntoucht so farre as the truth will suffer. For howsoeuer he taketh heed to himselfe onely, so that he tell no

To uphold truth we are in the ninth commandement forbidden the abuse of the tongue in hindring our neighbour, & commanded to employ it for his benefit.

Exod. 23. 1.
Leui. 19. 15.

The great illerie which men vse in this lies on transferring the lawe to their own vices, & thus to excuse their ill doings.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

lie, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, that God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill speaking is vterly condemned. But we meane not by euill speaking, that rebuking which is vsed for chastisement: nor accusation, or iudiciall proccesse, whereby remedie is sought for an euill, nor publick reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in fear, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behooueth that they should be forwarned least they should be in danger by ignoraunce: but we meane only hateful accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnesse & of a wanton wil to backbite. Also this comāndement is extended to this point, that we couet not to vse a scoffing kind of pleasur, but mingled with bitter taunts, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faults vnder pretence of pastime, as many do that seek praise of merie conceits with other mens shame yea and grieffe: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproched. Now if we bend our eyes to the lawmaker, which must according to his rightful authority bear rule no lesse ouer the eares and mind than ouer the toong: truly we shall finde that greedines to heare backbitings, and a hastie readinesse to euill iudgements are no lesse forbidden. For it were verie fonde if a man should thinke that God hateth the fault of euill speaking in the toong, and doth not disallow the fault of euill maliciousnesse in the heart. Wherefore if there be in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs inducours so far as we may and as is expedient, and as charity beareth, that we gree neither our toong, nor our eares to euill speakings, and bitter iestings, least we rashly without cause yeeld our minds to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent exposicours of all mens sayings, and doings, let vs both in iudgement, eares, and toong gently preserue their honour safe.

The tenth Commaundement.

Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house, &c.

As the former commaundements haue deliuered a rule of charitie to gouerne our euill iudges and works: so the last commaundement requireth the verie first conceptions of the mind to be framed according to the same rule.

49 The end of this commaundement is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule be wholly possessed with the affection of loue: all lust is to be shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may moue our mindes with a concupiscence hurtfull and turning toward an others losse: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commaundement, that whatsoeuer we conceiue, purpose, will or studie vpon, be ioyned with the benefite and commoditie of our neighbours. But here as it seemeth, ariseth a hard and combersome difficultie. For if it be truly saide of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are contrayned the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes should afterward be severally forbidden vs. But the distinction betweene purpose and coueting, will easily loose vs this knorre. For purpose (as wee haue meant in speaking of it in the other commaundements before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but coueting may be without any such either aduisement or assent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and peruerse obiects. As therefore the Lorde hath heretofore commaunded, that the rule of charitie should gouerne our willes, studies, and works: so nowe he commaundeth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde an other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and lead into wrath, hatred, fornication, robbetrie, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be moued threunto.

The last commaundement which is by some remoued.

50 And not without cause doth he require so great vprightnesse. For who can denie that it is righteous, that all the powers of the soule be possessed with charitie?

But if any of them do swarue from the marke of charitie, who can denie that it is diseased? Now whence commeth it that so many desires hurtfull to thy neighbour, do enter in thy hart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest only for thy selfe? For if thy minde were altogether thoroughly foked with charitie, no parcell thereof shoulde be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needs be void of charitie, so farre as it receiueth concupiscence. But some man will object, that yet it is not meete that fantasies that are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length doe vanish away, shoulde be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the hart. I answer that heere our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our mindes, doe together bite and strike our hart with desire, forasmuch as it neuer commeth in our minde, to wish for any thing, but that our hart is stirred vp. and leapeth withall. Therefore God commandeth a maruelous feruentnes of loue which he willeth not to be entangled with neuer so small sinnes of concupiscence. He requireth a maruelously framed minde, which he suffreth not so much as with slight prouocatiōs to be any thing stirred against the law of loue. To this exposition Augustine did first open me the way: because thou shouldest not thinke that it is without consent of some graue authoritie. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs all wrongfull coueting: yet in rehearsing that same, he hath brought foorth for example those things that most commonly doe deceiue vs with a false image of delight: because he would leaue nothing to concupiscence when hee draweth it from these things, vpon the which it most of all rageth and triumpheth. Lo, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what wee owe to men for Gods sake, vpon consideration whereof hangeth the rule of charitie. Wherefore you shall but vainly call vpon those duties that are contained in this Table, vnlesse your doctrine do stay vpon the feare & reuerence of God, as vpon hir foundation. As for them which seeke for two commandements, in the prohibition of coueting, the wise reader, though I say nothing, wil iudge that by wrong diuisiō, they tear in sunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against vs, that this word, Thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after that hee had first set the house, then hee renteth the parts thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeereth, that (as the Hebrewes do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, & that God in effect commandeth, that al that euery man possesseth, should remaine safe and vntouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraud them, but also from the very least desire that may moue our minds.

51 But now to what end the whole law tendeth, it shall not bee hard to iudge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteousnesse, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do perform in deeds, that which is therin commanded, hee shall in a manner expresse an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses went to bring the sum thereof into the mindes of the Israelites, he said: And now Israel, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, & walke in his waies? loue him and serue him in all thy hart, and in all thy soule, and keepe his commandements? And he ceased not still to sing the same song againe vnto them, to oft as he purposed to shewe the ende of the law. The destinie of the lawe hath such respect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moses in another place termeth it, maketh man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Now the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the two principall points already rehearsed. That wee loue the Lorde God with all our hart, all our soule, and all our strength, and our neighbours as our selues. And the first indeede is, that our soule be in all parts filled with the loue of God. From that by and by of it selfe foorth floweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sheweth when hee writeth, that the end of the law is loue out of a pure conscience, and a faith not fained. You see how, as it misse into two, containes not bare conceptions or fancies, but such as do use & stirre the mind with desire repugnant to that which perfect charity requireth, of which kinde of concupiscences those are rehearsed for examples sake which are most vsuall in men.

The drift of the lawe is to such perfect behauiour, which consisteth in pure love towards God and man, and not to set downe onely certain commandments that were afterwards to be further perfected. Deut. 10. 12.

were, in the head is set conscience and faith vsained, that is to say in one word true godlines, and that from thence is charitie deriued. Therefore he is deceiued, whoeuer thinketh that in the Law are taught onely certaine rudimentes and first introductions of righteousnesse, wherewith men became to be taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good workes: whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paul, you can desire nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For how far I pray you, will he proceede that will not be contented with this institution, wherby man is instructed to the feare of God, to spirituall worshipping, to obeying of the Commandements, to followe the vprightnes of the way of the Lord: finally to purenes of conscience, sincere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that exposition of the Law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the duties of godlinesse and loue. For they that follow onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods will, know not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

The reason why in the Prophecies and the Gospell so often times wherunto the keeping of the law is spoken of the duties onely of the second Table are expressly mentioned.

Mat. 5. 13.

Mat. 19. 28.

52 But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the Law, Christ and the Apostle doe sometime leaue out the first Table: many are deceiued therein while they would faime draw their wordes to both the Tables. Christ in Mathew calleth the chiefe points of the Law, mercie, iudgement, and faith: vnder the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to me, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulnessse toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole Law, take it for religiousnesse toward God. But they labor in vaine. For Christ speaketh of those workes wherewith man ought to prooue himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also cease to maruell why, when a young man asked him what be the commandements by keeping wherof we enter into life: he answered these things onely: Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steale. Thou shalt beare no false witness. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbor as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection of the hart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the hart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continuallie vse. But the workes of charitie are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousnesse. But this commeth eche where so oft in the Prophecies, that it must needs be familiar to a reader, but meanlie exercised in them. For in a manner alway, when they exhort to repentance, they leaue out the first Table, and onely call vpon Faith, Iudgement, Mercie, and Equitie. And thus they doe not ouerskip the feare of God, but they enquire the earnest prooffe thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowne, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they doe for the most part rest vpon the second Table, because therein the study of righteousnesse and vprightnes is most openly seene. It is needlesse to rehearse the places, because euery man will of himselfe easily make that which I say.

Our charitie towards one is a prooffe & ex. of fulfilling our obligatiō towards God.

Phil. 16.

Ioh. 1. 5.

Col. 3. 14.

Rom. 13.

Mat. 23. 23.

53 But thou wilt say, is it then more available to the perfection of righteousness, to liue innocently among men, than with true godlinesse to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily keepe charitie in all points, vnlesse he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby prooued, that he hath godlinesse also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifie by the Prophet: therefore he requireth not our duties to himselfe, but doth exercise vs in good workes toward our neighbor. Therefore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charitie. And not inconveniently in another place he calleth the same the fulfilling of the law: adding that he hath performed the law that loueth his neighbour. Again, That all the law is comperched in one word, Loue thy neighbor as thy selfe. For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doth when he saith: Whatsoeuer ye wish that men should do to you, doe ye the same to them: For this is the law and the Prophecies. It is certain, that in the Law, and the Prophecies Faith and all that belongeth to the the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, and that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the Law is onely prescribed vnto vs an obseruation of right and equitie, wherein we be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Here therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall be best framed to Gods will and the rule of his Law, when it shall be euery way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole Law there is not read one syllable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as he shall doe or leaue vndone to the commoditie of his owne flesh. And surely sith men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they be too much carried all headlong to the loue of themselves, and howe much soeuer they fall from the truth yet still they keepe that selfe lone, there needed no law any more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyond measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the loue of our selues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the Commandements, and that he liueth best and most holily, that (so neere as may be) liueth and trauelleth least for himselfe, and that no man liueth worse and more wickedly than he that liueth and trauelleth for himselfe and onely thinketh vpon and seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because he had no other vehementer or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner of speaking is diligently to be weyed. For he doth not, as certaine Sophisters haue foolishly dreamed, giue the first degree to the loue of our selues, and the second to charitie, but rather that affection of loue which we doe all naturally draw to our selues, he giueth away vnto other, whercupon the Apostle saith, that Charitie seeketh not hir owne. And their reason is not to be esteemed worth a haire that the thing ruled is euer inferior to his Rule. For God doth not make the loue of our selues, a rule whercunto charitie toward other should be subiect, but whereas by peruerfensse of nature, the affection of loue was wont to rest in our selues, he sheweth that now it ought to be elsewhere spread abroad, that we should with lesse cheerefulness, fctuentnes, and carefulnes be ready to doe good to our neighbour than to our selues.

55 Now sith Christ had shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour euery man is contained be hee neuer so strange vnto vs: there is no cause why we should restrain the commandement of loue within the boundes of our owne friendships and acquaintances. I deny not that the neerer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our iudicious to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requireth, that so many moe dueties of friendship men should communicate together, as they are bound together with streighter bondes of kinred, familiaritie or neighborhood, and that without any offence of God, by whose prouidence we are in a manner driuen thercunto. But I say that all mankind without exception is to be imbraced with, one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God and not in themselves: from which consideration when we turne away, it is no maruell if we be entangled with many errors. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of louing, we must not turne our eyes vnto man, the sight of whom would offer enforce vs to hate then to loue, but vnto God which commandeth that the loue which we offer him, be powred abroad among all men: that this be a perpetual foundation, that whatsoeuer the man be, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoolemen of these commandements, touching not desiring of reuengement, and louing

our enemies, which in the old time both were giuen to the Iewes and at the same time were commonly giuen to all Christians, haue made Counsels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they haue posted ouer to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keepe the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receive them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdenous and heauie, specially for Christians that are vnder the lawe of grace. So dare they presume to repell the eternal law of God touching the louing of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in anie lease of the law? and are not therein the rather each where found commandments that doe most severely require of vs to loue our enemies? For what manner of saying is that, where we are commaunded to feede our enemy when he is hungrie: to set into the right waie his Oxen or Asses straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint vnder their burden? Shall we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good will to himselfe? What? is not the word of the Lord euerglasting? Leauie vengeance to me, and I will require it. Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place. Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindfull of the iniury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not lyingly faime that he was a counsell giuer.

57 And what I praie you meane these things that they haue presumed to mocke withall in their vsauoric glose? Loue your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heauen. Who cannot heare reason with Chrysolostome, that by so necessary a cause it plainlie appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandments? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monkes shall be the children of the heauenlie father, they only shall be bold to call vpon God their Father: what shall the Church do in the meane season? it shall by like right a way to the Gentils and Publicans. For Christ saith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what fauour looke you for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdom of heauen taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Auustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemy than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leaue to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or thy enemy. But these two, not to steale, and not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compass of the rule of loue, yea and teacheth that they are contained vnder this commandment, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expositor of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loued, euen by commandment, like as our friends. Therefore they do truly bewray themselves to be the children of Satan, that do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine with more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of the olde writers that do not pronounce as of a thing certain, that these are mere commandments. And that euen in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without controuertie taketh them for commandments. And how foolishly do they reason? They say that they are too weightie a burden for Christians. As though there could be deuised any thing more weighty than to loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be compted easie, whether it be to loue our enemy, or to lay away all desire of reuenge out of our mind. In deede all things are high and hard to our weaknes euen the least title of the law. It is the Lord in whom we vse strength. Let him giue what he commandeth, and command what he will. Christian men to be vnder the lawe of grace, is not vnbridledly to wander without law, but to be graffed in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the Law, and by whose spirite they haue a law written in their harts. This grace Paul vnproperly called a law, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men doe in the name of the law, dispute vpon a matter of nothing.

Lord

58 Of like sort it is that they called Venial sinne, both secret vngodlinesse that is against the first Table, and also the direct transgressing of the last Commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without aduised assent, which resteth not long in the hart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the hart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We forbid to haue strange gods. When the minde shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere, when it is touched with a sodaine desire to remoue his blessedness some other way: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule empty, to receiue such tentations? And to the end not to draw out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement giuen to loue God with all our hart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the loue of God, we haue already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdome, and interrupt his decrees, doe prooue that God hath not his throne well stablished in our conscience. As for the last commandement, we haue already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guilty of coueting, & therewithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lord doth forbid vs, not onely to purpose and practise any thing that may be to anothers losse, but also to be pricked and swell with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang ouer the transgression of the law. We cannot therefore prooue euen the very least desires free from iudgement of death. In weying of finnes (saith Augsstine) let vs not bring false balances to weigh what we list and how we list at our own pleasure, saying: this is heauy and this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lords treasure, and let vs therein weigh what is heauy: rather let vs not wey, but acknowledge things already weighed by the Lord. But what saith the Scripture? Truly when Paul saith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this stinking distinction. Sith we are too much inclined to hypocrisie, this cherishment thereof ought not to haue bene added to flatter our slothfull consciences.

59 I would to God they would consider what that saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so, shall be counted none in the kingdome of heauen. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the law, as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to haue considered, not onely what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authoritie is diminished in euery transgression, how little soeuer it be, of the law that he hath giuen in commandement. Is it a small matter with them, that Gods maiestie be offended in any thing? Moreover if God hath declared his will in the law, whatsoeuer is contrarie to the law, displeaseth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not forthwith follow vpon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their harts to heare his voice, than to trouble cleare truth with their vnsonourie subtleties of argument. The soule (saith he) that sanctifieth, the same shall die Againe, which I euen now alleaged, the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they graunt it to be a sinne, because they cannot deny it: yet they stand stille in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they haue hitherto too much Lome with their owne madnesse, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of God, which of necessitie prouoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the law, vpon which the iudgement of God is pronounced without exception: and that the sins of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercie of God.

BEcause it pleased God in the olde time not vainely by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in-vaine he did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: euen then without doubt he was knownen in the same image, wherein he now appeareth to vs with full brightnesse. Therefore Malachie, after that he had bidden the Iewes to take heed to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in studie thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a sonne of righteousness. In which wordes he teacheth, that the Lawe auaileth to this purpose, to hold the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophets did make search, and diligently enquire, of the saluation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was reueiled vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselues, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing auailed themselues: but because they enjoyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little sip of it, there is offered vnto vs a more plentifull enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witness borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eyes that see that which ye see, and blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many kings and Prophets haue wished it, and haue not obtained it. This is no small commendation of the reuicling of the Gospell that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place disagreeeth not, where it is said, that Abraham sawe the day of Christ, and reioyced. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, ye he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that ioy which accompanied the holy Prophet, euen to his death: And that saying of Iohn Baptist: No man hath seene God at any time, the onely begotten that is in the bosome of the father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had bin dead before him, from the fellowip of the vnderstanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ: But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that those mysteries, which they sawe but darkely vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diuersly and manie waies spake in olde time by the Prophets, but now by his beloued sonne, although therefore that onely begotten one, which is at this day to vs the brightnesse of the glorie, and the print of the substance of God the father, was in olde time knownen to the Iewes, as we haue in another place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the olde deliuerance: yet is it true, which the same Paul else where teacheth, that God which commanded the light to shine out of darkenesse, hath now shined upon our hearts to set forth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Iesus Christ: because when he appeared in this his image, he did in a manner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had bene of him before. And so much the more foule and detestable in their vnthankfulnes and peruersenesse, that are here to blinde at mid day. And therefore Paul saith, that their mindes are darkened by Sathan, that they shoulde not see the glorie of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set between them and it.

2 Nowe I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the mysteric of Christ. I grant truly, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the law, concerning the free forgiveness of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts thereof. For he compareth faith against these terrours, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be sought by works. Whereupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it all the testimonies that God in old time gaue to the fathers, of his mercy & fatherlie fauor: But in the more excellent signification of it, I saie it is applied to the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ. And that meaning is not onely received by common vse, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospell of the kingdom. And Marke maketh his preface in this manner, The beginning of the Gospell of Iesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to prooue a thing sufficiently knowen. Christ therefore by his comming hath made cleere the life and immortalitie by the Gospell. By which wordes Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogative of honour to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kinde of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the sonne. For although the faithfull haue alway found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their hearts: yet because he hath accomplished all parts of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that selfe liuely deliuering of the things rightfully obtained a new and singular title of praise. Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ: Hereafter yee shall see the heauens open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending vpon the soune of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Jacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie thereof may stande familiarly open to all men.

3 But yet we must take heede of the diuelish imagination of Seruetus, which when he goeth about, or at least saith that he goeth about, to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, utterly abolisheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference between vs and Christ. I did in deed euen now declare that Christ left nothing vnperformed of the whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe alreadie enioy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our saluation is hidden in hope. I graunt indeede, that we by beleeuing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the meane season wee must hold this saying of Iohn, that although we knowe we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shall be like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fullnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enioying thereof lyeth still hid vnder the keeping of hope, till being vnclodded of the corruptible flesh, we be transfigured into the glorie

Although in the law and the Prophets there be many promises concerning the free forgiveness of sins, yet the name of the Gospell properly taken is not applicable vnto them but onely to the publishing of grace now giuen in Iesus Christ.

Iohn 1. 52.

We may not with Seruetus thinke that because the promises made before are accomplished in Christ, therefore they are abolished, so as Christians are not to looke for any further enioyng of things promised than they haue attained already.

of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holie Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthy dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason hee boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that we haue the same promises, which in the old time were giuen to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise, but yet we doe no otherwise enjoy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he indeed dwelleth in our harts, and yet we wander in iourney abroad from him: because we walke by faith and not by sight. And these two things doe not ill agree together: that we possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heavenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing which the law did shadow vnder figures.

1. Tim. 4. 8.

2. Tim. 1.

2. Cor. 7.

The Gospell is not so opposite to the lawe, as teaching another way of saluation, but the same more plainly.

4 And hereby also is their error conuincd, which doe neuer otherwise compare the law with the Gospell, but as they compare the merites of workes with the free imputation of righteousnesse. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be reiected: because Paul doth oftentimes vnderstande by the name of the lawe, a rule to liue righteously, wherein God requireth of vs, that which is his, not giuing vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do neuer so little swaue from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous, because the obseruation of the law, whereunto the reward is promised, is nowhere founde. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousnes of the law and of the Gospell, contrarie the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succede in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diuerse meane of saluation, but rather to confirme and prouue to be of force, whatsoeuer the law had promised, & to ioyne the bodie to the shadowes. For when Christ saith, that the law and the Prophets were vntill Iohn: he maketh not the fathers subiect to the curse, which the bondseruants of the law can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so as they staid a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paul calling the Gospell the power of God, to saluation to euerie beleuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witness of the law and the prophets. Eu: in the end of the same Epistle, although he shew that the title of praise of Iesus Christ is the reuelation of the mysterie kept secret in the euerlasting times: yet hee doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that hee is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole law, the Gospell distreth from the law onely in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath bene laide open for vs in Christ, it is now not without cause said, that at his comming the heavenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

The preaching of Iohn a meane betwene the law & the Gospell. In which respect his office differing both from the prophets and Apostles hee is termed greater than the one and lesse than the other.

4 Now betwene the lawe and the Gospell came Iohn, which had an office that was meane and of assuatie to them both. For though when hee called Christ the lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed foorth the sum of the Gospell: yet because he did not expresse that same incomparable strength and glorie, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith, that he was not equall to the Apostles. For so do those words of his meane: that though Iohn excell among the sonnes of women, yet hee that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred Iohn before the Prophets, he aduanceth the preaching of the Gospell

Gospell to the highest degree: which preaching we see in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas Iohn himselfe doth answere that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophets, he doth not that for fained humilities sake, but in eaneth to teach that the proper office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachie: Behold, I send Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeouour to get disciples to Christ: as also Esay prouoeth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candle burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but that he may be reckoned among the publishers of the Gospell, like as he used the same Baptisme, which was afterward deliuered to the Apostles. But that which he began, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heauenly glorie.

The x. Chapter.

Of the likeness of the old and new Testament.

BY the things aforesaide it may now appeere euidently, that all the men whome from the beginning of the world God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which now remaineth in force among vs, bounde in couenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adioine vnto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of all one Mediatour, how farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that wee haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for prooff thereof, doe make it plaine that there was neuer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of God: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many things spoken of the difference of the old and new Testament, that may make the Reader that is not of verie sharpe iudgement to bee in doubt: therefore we shall rightfully appoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter: Yea, and that thing also, which otherwise should haue bene verie profitable for vs, is now made necessarie by that monstrous losell Sernettus and by diuers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptistes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israell, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondly faine to haue beene fattred vp by the Lord here in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortalitie. Therefore that we may keepe away this pestilent error from godly mindes, and also to plucke out of them all doubts which are wont by and by to arise vpon hearing mention of the diuersitie betwene the olde and the new Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what unlike one to the other: what couenant the Lorde made with the Israelites in the olde time before the coming of Christ, and what couenant he hath now made with vs since Christ hath been openly shewed.

A thing necessary to know: the agreement & difference between our selves and the fathers under the law.

2 And both these points may be made plaine with one worde. The couenant of all the fathers to differeth nothing from ours in substance and in matter it selfe, that it is altogether one and the selfesame: but the manifestation is diuers. But because of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a certaine understanding, wee must needes proceed on with a longer declaration if we meane to profite any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shall be superfluous to discourse againe of new vpon all the speciall particulars that haue already bene declared: and it shall be out of season to mingle those things together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest vpon three principall pointes:

The fathers had the same couenants which we haue: they looked for immortalitie and had it promised: they expected it by mercie and not by merite: they knew that Christ was then mediator to obtaine mercie, as well as we.

First,

Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of

First, that we holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the marke appointed to the Iewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosē vnto the hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the covenant whereby they were ioyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the onely mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the Mediatour, by whom they should both be ioyned to God and enjoy his promises. Of which points, because the seconde peradventure is not yet sufficiently known, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many and cleere testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodnesse and tender fauour, whatsoeuer good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israel. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declaration of it, and we haue not left the first altogether vntouched.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most controuersie about it, we wil employ the more earnest trauell: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in conuenient place be added. Truly, the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospell, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the rightousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospell it selfe, hath witness of the Lawe and the Prophets. For the Gospell doeth not holde the hearts of men in the ioy of this present life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not fasten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope laide vp in heauen, doth in a manner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in another place. Since that ye beleued the Gospell, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesu, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is laid vp for you in heauen, whereof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospell. Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospell to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called both the word of saluation, and the power of God to saue the faithfull, and the kingdome of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Gospell be spirituall, and openeth the entrie to the possession of an incorruptible life: let vs not thinke that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe ouer and neglect the care of their soule, and lie dully like beastes in seeking pleasures of the bodie. Neither let any man here cauill that the promises which are sealed in the lawe and the Prophets, concerning the Gospell, were ordamed for the new people. For within a litle after, that which he spake of the Gospell promised in the lawe, he addeth, that all the things that the lawe containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are vnder the lawe. I graunt in deede it is in another argument. But he was not so forgetfull, that when he had once saide that all the things which the lawe containeth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a few verses before he had affirmed of the Gospell promised in the lawe. Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the olde Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he saith, that vnder it are contained the promises of the Gospell.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stood vpon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the verie preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are iustified by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne deseruing, and the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whome wee heare that the covenant of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation? Who dare make them strangers from the benefite of free saluation, to whom

As well to the fathers vnder the law as to vs in the Gospell promises were made of the life to come and not of temporall happines onely.

The same mercie by vertue of the same mediator sctued the fathers which saith vs.

whom we heare that the doctrine of the righteousnesse of faith was ministred? But, that we dispute not long of an euident matter, we haue a notable sentence of the Lord. Abraham reioyced that he might see my day, he saw it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was vniuersall in the faithfull people, when he saith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for euer. For he speakech not there onely of the eternall godhead of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed virgine and Zacharie in their songs, do say, that the saluation reuealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in old time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lord in giuing his Christ, discharged his olde oath, it cannot be saide but that the end thereof was alway in Christ an euerlasting life.

5 Yea, and the Apostle doth make the Israclites equall with vs, not onely in the grace of the covenant, but also in signification of sacraments. For meaning by examples of punishments, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they should not runne into the like offences, he beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why we should challenge any prerogatiue vnto our selues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they susteined, forasmuch as the Lorde did not onely graunt vnto them the same benefits, but he hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if he should haue saide: If yee trust that yee be out of perill, because both Baptisme wherewith yee be marked, and the Supper which yee daily receiue, haue excellent promises, and in the meane time despising the goodnes of God, yee are licentiously wanton: Know yee, that the Jewes also were not without such sacraments, against whom yet the Lorde did most severely put his iudgements in execution. They were Baptised in passing ouer the sea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heate of the Sunne. They saie, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spirituall Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth heere to haue this taken away from the Christians, that they thinke that they exceed the Jewes by the prerogatiue of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subiect to this caualation: that they did eate the same spirituall meate that we eate, and drunke the same spirituall drinke, which hee expoundeth to be Christ.

Equalitie between the fathers and vs in the thing signified both by their & our sacraments
1. Cor. 10. 1. & 11

6 To ouerthrowe this sentence of Paul, they obiect that which Christ saith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wilderness, and are dead: hee that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer. Which two places are very easly made to agree together. The Lorde, because he then talked to hearers that sought onely to be filled with foode of their bellies, but cared not for the meate of the soule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacite, but especially he frameth the comparison of Manna and of his bodie according to their sense. They required that he, to get himselfe some credite, would approoue his power with dooing some such miracle, as Moses did in the Wilderness, when he obtained Manna from heauen. But in Manna they conceived nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, which with the people was then vexed: but they perceiued not that higher mystrie which Paul hath respect vnto Christ therefore, to shew how much greater a benefit they ought to look for at his hands, than that which they reported that Moses did bestow vpon their fathers, frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthy to be remembered, that the Lorde by Moses ministred food from heauen to his people, to iustame them for a small time, that they should not perish for hunger in the wilderness: gather hence how much more excellent is the meate that giueth immortallitie. We see why the Lorde passed ouer that thing which was principall in Manna, and spake onely

The words of Christ in saying: Your fathers did eate Manna and are dead: doe not contradict the Apostle which saith: They did eate the same spirituall meate that we eat. For they know how Christ speaketh of him occasion not to touch the mystrie but onely the carnall use of the Manna.

Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of onely of the basest profite of it: euen because the Iewes as it were of purpose to reproch him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna: hee answered that he is the minister of a much higher grace, in comparison whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because hee knew that the Lord when he rayned Manna from heauen, did not onely powre it downe for the feeding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that part that was most woorthie of consideration. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heauenly life, which now the Lorde vouchsafeth to graunt vnto vs, were not onely communicated vnto the Iewes, but also sealed with very spirituall Sacraments. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Fustius the Munich.

Sith the fathers were enlightened and coupled vnto God by the seede of that word which is immortall, it sheweth that they had the benefite of immortallitie and eternall life.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue testimonies alleaged vnto them out of the lawe and the Prophets, whereby they may perceiue that the spirituall couenant was common also to the fathers, as we heare by Christ and the Apocstles: I will also followe that desire, and so much the more willingly, because by that meane the aduersaries shall be more surely conuincd, so that they shall haue afterward no way to dally. And I will begin at that prooffe, which although I knowe that the Anabaptists pride will thinke very sonde and in a manner to be laughed at, yet shall much auaille with such readers as are willing to learne and haue their sound wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the worde of God, that whome so euer God vouchsafeth to bee partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For the saying of Peter hath alway bene of force, that it is the incorruptible seede which abideth for euer, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Nowe sith God in the old time bounde the Iewes vnto him with this holy bonde, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced that word, which should ioine them nigher to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it: not that generall manner, which is powred abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the worlde, which although it doe quicken all things, euery one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliuer them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this speciall maner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a manner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaued vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortall kingdome of God. For it was a found partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefite of eternall life.

The forme of the couenant of God with the fathers promising to bee their God, proueth that eternall life was promised them.

8 But if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the very forme of the couenant, which shall not onely satisfie sober wits, but also shall sufficiently conuince their ignorance that bend themselues to speake against it. For God did alwaies thus couenant with his seruants: I will be to you a God, and ye shall be to me a people. In which words the Prophets themselues are wont to expound, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For Daniell doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but because he deliuereth them from death, hee preferueth them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternall mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophets, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lord is our king, our lawmaker, he shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israell, because thou art saued in the Lorde God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needelesse, this admonition is founde each where in the Prophets, that wee shall want nothing towarde all abondance of good things, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lord be our God. And rightfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation, to what man shall hee openly shewe himselfe for his God, but that he will also open to him his treasure of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the middlest of vs: as he testified by Moses. But such presence cannot be obtained, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spirituall life plaine ynough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousnesse remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring cuerlasting saluation with it.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifie that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the end that their hope not contented with present benefites, should be extended to eternitie. And many sayings do shewe, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not only in present euils, but also for the time to come, do comfort themselves with this, that God will neuer faile them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of God to be prolonged vnto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seede after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his fauour not faile toward themselves. For God is not like vnto men, which do therefore carie their loue to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so that they cannot employ their friendly doings vpo them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifullnes is not hindered by death, taketh not away fro the verie dead the fruite of the mercie, which for their sakes he poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable prooffe to set forth vnto them the greatnes & flowing plentie of his goodnes, which they should feele after death, when he described it to be such as should flowe ouer into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then seale, and as it were broughe sooth the fulfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, long after their death. For, what had it not bin a fond naming, if they had vtterly perished? For then had it bin all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Euangelists recheare, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so drinen to a strait, that they could not denie that Moses did testifie the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the iudge of life and death had receiued into his safegard, custodie, and protection.

10 Nowe (which is the principall point whereupon this controuersie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithfull themselves haue not bene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceiued that they should haue a better life elsewhere, and in neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was emoynd them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserabile of all men, if their happinesse were only in this life. Adam, most vnhappy, euen with only remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painfull labors hardly susteine his needinesse, and that he should not be prest with the curse of God, in the only labours of his hands, euen there receiued he extreme sorrowe of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left aloue, whose sight he worthily detested and abhorred. Abel cruelly murdered in the verie floure of his age, became an example of the wretchednes of men. Noe, while the whole world carelesly liued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearines in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should haue dyed an hundred deathes. For beside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne moneths, there is nothing more vnpleasant than to be holden so long in maner drowned in dung of beasts. When he had passed ouer so great difficulties, he fell into new matter of greefe, he sawe himselfe scorned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefite of God he had receiued safe from the generall flood.

Gen. 12.4.

None more miserable than Abraham, if his condition in this life only be respected.

II Abraham in deede may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if we consider his faith, which is set foorth vnto vs for the best rule of beleeuing, of whose kinred we must be accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be thrown downe out of the number, no not from the most honourable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Now as touching the experiences of his life: When he was first called by the commaundement of God, he was plucked away from his countrey, his parents and his friends, in whome men thinke to be the chiefe sweetenesse of life: euen as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoyie him of all the pleasures of life. So soone as he came into the land where he was commaunded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to saue himselfe, he was compelled to deliuer out his wife to be abused, which we know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deathes. When he was returned into the land of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that land, wherein a man must so oft be hungrie, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewithall he was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that he must needs redeeme his life with the losse of his wife, while manie yeares long he wandred vncertainly hither and thither, he was compelled by the continuall brawlings of his seruants to put away his nephewe, whome he loued as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt he did no otherwise take than if he had suffered the cutting off of one of his limmes. A litle after, he heard that he was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whither soeuer he went, he found neighbours outragiously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the welles that himselfe had digged with great labour. For he would not haue redeemed the vse of them at the hand of King Gerar, if he had not first beene forbidden. Now when he came to old age, he sawe the thing which is the most vnpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismael, whose birth yet he paid deere for, when he was wearied with the brayling of Sara, as if he in maintaining the stubbornesse of his bondwoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his houtholde. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismael must, as forsaken, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whome the wearied age of the fillie good man might rest, within a litle after he was commaunded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any sickenesse, who would not haue thought the old man most miserable, that had a sonne giuen him in mockage, for whom his grieffe of want of children should be doubled? If he had beene slaine by some stranger, the unhappinesse of the thing would haue much encreased his miserie. But this passeth all examples of miserie, to haue him slaine with his fathers owne hand. Finally, he was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none moie fit than this of Abraham. And let no man obiect that he was not altogether unhappie, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great temptiffs.

Gen. 12.12.

For we cannot say that he liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully weareth out of infinit troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euils, yet scarce euer tooke any taste of sweetnesse. He also felt the same vexations, that do not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chased him out of the land of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all means oppressed him, so that he was faine to strue for his water: at home in his owne house, he suffred much troublefomnesse by his childrens wiues, he was grieved with disagreements of his sons, and could not remedie that so great a mischiefe, but by the banishment of him whom he had blessed. But as for Iacob, he is nothing else but a notable example of extreme infelicitie. He passed his childhoode most vnquietly at home among the threatnings and terrours of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to giue place. When hee was fledde from his parents and his natie countrie, beside that it was a grieuous thing to lue in banishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently receiued of his vncl Laban. Then it sufficed not that hee had serued seuen yeere a harde and cruell seruice, but that also must bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wiues sake he was driuen into new seruice, where he was all the day fried with heate of the sunne, and all the night lay waking and pained with frost & cold, as himselfe complained. While he by the space of twentie yeeres suffred so harde a life, he was dailie vexed with new iniuries of his father in lawe. Neither was he quiet in his owne house, seeing it diuided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enuie of his wiues. When he was commanded to returne into his countrie, he was compelled to watch an aduantage to take his iourney, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could he not so escape the vniust dealing of his Father in lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his iourney. Then fell he into a much more cruell distresse. For when hee came neere to his brother, he had so manie deaths before his eyes, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enimie. So was hee about measure tormented and as it were drawn insunder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers comming, when he came once in his sight, he fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, vntil he found him more fauourable than he durst haue hoped. Beside that, at his first entrie into the lande, he lost Rachel his deerey beloued wife. Afterward he heard worde that the sonne which he had by her, and whome therefore he loued about the rest, was torne with wilde beafts: by whose death how great grieffe he conceived, he himselfe declared in this that after long weeping he obstinately stopped vp all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leauing himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his sonne wailing into the graue. In the meane time how great causes of grieffe, waiting and wearines were the rauishment and deflouring of his daughter, and the boldnesse of his sons in reuenging it, which not only made him to be abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that countrie, but also procured him most present perill of vter destruction? Then followed that horrible outragious offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as there could not chaunce a more grieuous. For whereas the defling of a mans wife is reckoned among the highest ill fortunes: what is to bee saide of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a litle while after, his house is spotted with another vnnaturall adulterie: so that so manie shames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while he sought to prouide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tydings of a new misfortune, vnderstanding that another of his sons was kept in prison, for recouering of whom hee was compelled to leaue to the rest Beniamin his onely darling. Who can thinke, that in such a heape of mischiefes he had any one moment giuen him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himfelfe the best witnes of himfelfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his daies were short and euill vpon the earth. Now truly he that declareth that he hath paffed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperitie which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindly and vnthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truly professed that he had bene miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened vpon earthly things.

Gen. 47.9.

As the life of the fathers sheweth, so the Apostle witnesseth that they looked for other than earthly blessednes at the hands of God.

Heb. 11.9.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as vndoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truly they both thought and sawe it to be another manner of blessednes, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doth shew excellently wel: Abraham (saith he) direct by faith in the lande of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Iacob parteners with him of the same inheritance, for they looked for a citie set vpon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promised, but looking at them a farre off, and beleuing and confessing that they were guesstes & strangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare that they fought for a countrie, and if they had bene mouued with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they fought for a better, that is the heavenly countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bene duller than blockes, to follow promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vntill they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefly inforceth, & that not without good reason, that they called this life a iourney from home; euen as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers and forciners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lords promise, whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lords promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receiue the fruit of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his son Ioseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be remooued thither.

The righteous of old did accompt the end of ths life to be the beginning of a better.

Gen. 49.18.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the trauailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Iacob haue so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, vntill he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the words which he spake among his last breathings. Lord, I will looke for thy saluation. What saluation could he haue looked for, when he sawe that he lay readie to giue vp the Ghost, vnles he had seen in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute we of the holy ones and children of God, when euen he was not without a taste of such vnderstanding, which otherwise was enemie to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like vnto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that Dauid after ward vttered, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is verie euill: If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference between the righteous and vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diuinitie of the estates that after death shall befall to them both.

The hope which Dauid had of immortallitie.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the camall people to worship God by the fruitfulness of the ground ground and plentie of all things. And yet (vnlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall covenant. But if we come downe to the prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life euertlasting and the kingdome of Christ do vtter themselves. And first of all Dauid, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, he shewed the heauenly mysteries in shadows more darkly than the rest, yet with what plainnes and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? Howe he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am heere a forreiner and stranger, as all my fathers were. Euerie liuing man is vanitie, euery one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? euen to thee is my hope. Truly he that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnes of hope in god, considereth his felicity laid vp in another place. To such consideration is he wont to call all the faithful, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truly. For in another place after he had spoken of the shortnes, and the transitorie and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: But the mercie of the Lorde is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred and seconde Psalme. At the Beginning Lorde thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the workes of thy hands. They shall perith, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remaine the selfe same, and thy yeeres shall not faile: the sonnes of thy seruants shall dwell, and thy posteritie shall be established before thee. If the godlie cease not for the decaye of heauen and earth to be stablished before the Lorde, it followeth that their saluation is ioyned with the eternitie of God. But that hope cannot stand at all, vnles it rest vpon the promise that is set forth in Esaie: The heauens (saith the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth shall be worne out like a garment, and the inhabitants of it shall perith like those things: But my saluation shall bee for euer, and my righteousnesse shall not faile: where euertlastingnesse is giuen to righteousnes and saluation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

Psal. 101. 17.

Esaie. 51. 4.

16 Neither may we otherwise take those things, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous successe of the faithfull, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heauenly glorie. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deniur them from the hand of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and ioy to the vpright in hart. The righteousnes of the godly man abideth for euer: his home shall be exalted in glorie, the desire of the sinner shall perith. Againe: but the righteous shall confesse vnto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous shall bee in eternall remembrance. Againe: the Lorde shall redeeme the soules of his seruants. For the Lorde oftentimes leaueth his seruants to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to bee torne in peeces and destroyed: he suffereth the good to lie languishing in darkenes and filth, while the wicked doe in a manner shine among the starres. And hee doth not so cheere them with the brightnesse of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladnes. Wherefore euen he also hideth not, that if the faithfull fasten their eyes vpon the present state of things, they shall be stricken with a sore temptation, as though there were no fauour or reward of innocencie with God. So much doth wickednesse for the most part prosper and flourish, while the companie of the godlie is oppressed with shame, pouertie, contempt, and all kinds of crosses. It wanteth but little (saith he) that my foote slipped not, and my steps fell not abroad, while the fortune of fooles grieueth me, and while I see the prosperitie of the wicked. At length after rehearfall of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could vnderstande these things. But it is a torment to my spirit, till I enter into the sanctuarie of the Lord, and vnderstand the last end of them.

What Dauid speaketh of the faithfull mans prosperous successe, is hath relation to future blessedness in the worlde to come.

Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of

The expectation which David had of a judgement to come and felicitie so follow it.

17 Let vs therefore learne yet by this confession of David, that the holy fathers vnder the olde testament were not ignorant, how seldome or neuer God doth in this world performe to his seruants those things that he promisseth them, and that therefore they did lift vp their minds to Gods sanctuarie, wherein they had that laide vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last iudgement of God, which when they could nor see with eyes, they were content to vnderstand by Faith. Trusting vpon which assurance, whatsoever happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings doe witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousness: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Againe: I as a greene Olive tree in the house of the Lord. Againe, The righteous shall flourish as a date tree, & shall spread in branches like the Cedar of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They shall still beare fruit, they shall be fat and greene in their old age. When he had said a little before: How deepe are thy thoughts? O Lord, while the wicked doe flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for euer. Where is that faire shew and beautie of the faithfull, but when the face of this world shall be turned inward by disclosing of the kingdome of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternitie, they despised the hardnes enduring but a moment of present miseries, and boldly burst forth into these wordes: Thou shalt not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw downe the wicked headlong into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternall destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicities, this is also reckened in another place, that they close vp the end of their life in a moment without long languishing. Where is that so great stedfastnesse of the holy ones, whom David himselfe echwhere complaineth, not onely to bee shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, and vtterly broken in peeces? Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is vnstable and more vnstedfast than the ebbing and flowing of tides, but what the Lord will doe, when he shall one day sit for the eternall setting of heauen and earth. As in another place he excellently well describeth it: The foolish doe stay vpon their wealthines, and are proud because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flourish in neuer so great dignitie, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransome, but whereas they see that both the wise doe die, and that the wicked also and fooles doe perish and leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they aduance their names vpon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shall be like to the beastes that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their posteritie doe greedilie follow. They shall be placed like a flocke in Hell, and death shall haue rule ouer them. When the light ariseth, the vpright shall haue dominion ouer them, the beautie of them shall perish, Hell is their dwelling house. First, this laughing to scorne of the foolish for that they rest on the slippery and rolling good things of the world, doth shew that the wise must seeke a far other felicitie. But there he more evidently discloseth the mystery of the resurrection, where after the destruction and extinguishment of them, he creteth the kingdome of the godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shall we call that, but the reuicing of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

The faithfull could not haue comforted themselves, as both David and Samuel did with the momentane shortnes of their stroak.

18 From thence did spring vp that consideration, which the faithfull oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miseries and remedy of patience: It is but a moment in the Lords displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods kindnes, wherof they scarcely felt any little tast? If they had stuck fast vpon the earth, they could haue found no such thing, but because they looked vpon heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercisē his holy ones by the crosse, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do last the worlds age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and neuer ending destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shall be in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked most euill. Againe, in Sannuel: The Lord shall keepe the feete of the holy, and the wicked shall be put to silence in darkenes. Which doe declare that they well knew, that howeouer the holy were diuersly carried about, yet their last end is life and saluation: and that the prosperitie of the wicked is a pleasant way, whereby they by litle and litle slide forward into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the vncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore Dauid could not deaue a more grieuous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19 But about all other, notable is that saying of Iob: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the last day I shall rite againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my sauiour: This hope is laid vp in my boosome. Some that haue a mind to make a shew of their sharpe wit doe caull this is not to be vnderstanded of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Iob looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we graunt the more in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Iob could not haue come to that largesse of hope, if he had rested his thought vpon the earth. Therefore we must needs confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortalitie to come, which saw, that his redeemer would be present with him, euē lying in his graue. For to them that thinke onely of this present life, death is their vttermost desperation: which very death could not put off Iobs hope. Yea though he kill me (said he) neuertheles I will still hope in him. And let no trifter here carpe against me and say, that these were the sayings but of a few, whereby is not proued that such doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by and by answer him, that these few did not in these sayings utter any secret wisdom, wherunto only certaine excellent wits, were feuerally and priuately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of the people, so they openly published those mysteries of God, that were to be vniuersally learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spirituall life so clearly and plainly in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of vtterable stubbornnes to send them away onely to the fleshly couenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthnes.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophets, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for vs to get the vpper hand in Dauid, Iob, and Sannuel, here it shall be much more ease. For God kept this distribution and order in disposing the couenant of his mercy, that how much the nearer it drew on in proccesse of time to the full performancē therof, with so much greater increasements of reuelation he did day by day more brightly shew it. Therefore at the beginning when the first promise of saluation was made vnto Adam, there glittered out but as it were small sparkles of it. After, hauing more added vnto it, a greater largenes of light began to be put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and displayed his brightnes farther abroad, till at length all the cloudes were driven away, and Christ the sonne of righteoufnesse fully lightened the whole world. We neede not therefore to feare that we shall of testimonies of the Prophets, if we seeke them to prouoe our cause, but be a wise see that there will arise a huge deale of matter, wherupon I should be constrained of necessitie to tarry longer than the proportion of my purpose may

beare, for it would so grow to a worke of a great volume, and also be cause I haue already, by those things that I haue said before, made plaine the way, euen for a reader of meane capacity, so as he may go forward without stumbling: therefore I will at this present abstaine frō long tediousnesse: which to do is no lesse necessarie: but giuing the readers warning before hand, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we haue first giuen them in their hand. That is, that so oft as the Prophets speake of the blessednesse of the faithfull people, whereof scarcely the least steps are seene in this present life, they may resort to this distinction: that the Prophets the better to expresse the goodnesse of God, did as in a shadow expresse it to the people by temporall benefices, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they haue painted thereof, was such as might rauish mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elements of this world, and of the age that shall perish, and of necessitie raise it vp to the considering of the felicitie of the life that is to come and spirituall.

The power which God hath to giue life shewed by a vision of breath and liuelinesse restored to a field full of dead bones. Ezc. 37. 4.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being caried away to Babylon, saw their scattering abroad to be like vnto death, they could hardly be remoued frō this opiniō that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophecied to their restitution: because they reckoned it euen all one as if he had told them that rotten carcases should be restored againe to life. The Lord to shewe, that euen the same difficultie could not stop him frō bringing his benefit to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a field full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onelie power of his word he restored breath and liuelinesse. The vision in deede serued to correct the incredulitie at that present time: but in the meane season he did put the Iewes in mind how farre the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which so easlie quickened with his onelie becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherefore you shall compare that with an other saying of Esaie. The dead shall rise, my carcase, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and reioyce that dwell in the dust, because the dew of the greene field is thy dew, and thou shalt plucke downe the land of the Giants into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: shut thy dores vpon thee: hide thee a litle while, till my displeasure passe ouer. For behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visit the iniquitie of the dweller vpon the earth against him, and the earth shall shew foorth her blood, and shall no longer hide her flaine.

Immortalitie so come expressly spoken of by Esaie and Daniel.

Esa. 66. 22.

22 Albeit a man should doe fondlie, that would goe about to draw all to such a rule. For there be some places that without anye scouring doe shew the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdome of God, of which sort we haue recited some, and of like sort are the most part of the rest, specially these two, the one in Esaie. As a new heauen, and a new earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your seede stand, and there shall be moneth of moneth, and Sabbath of Sabbath: all flesh shall come to worship before my face, saith the Lord. And they shall go out and see the dead carcases of the men that haue offended, against me, that their worme shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall rise vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sonnes of his people, and there shall come a time of distresse, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people beaue that shall be found written in thy booke. And of those that sleepe in the dust of the earth, there shall awake some to eternall life, and some to euerlasting shame.

Dan. 12. 1.

Seeing that Christ prometh vs no rest but in his chē, and Peter cōprehēdeth vs in the same cōsent which God made

23 Now, as for prouing the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pidge of their couenant, and that they reposed in him all their affiance of blessing, I will not traude therein at all, because they haue both lesse controuersie and more plainnesse. Let vs therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the duell may be remoued, that the old testament, or couenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also contained the promise of the spirituall and eternall life: the expectation whereof must needs have been imprinted in all their minds that truly consented to the covenant. But let vs put far away this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Jewes nothing els, or that the Jewes sought nothing els but filling of their belly, delights of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outward power, fruitfulness of children, & whatsoeuer a naturall man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdome of heauen to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Jewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospell, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lord had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not be witnessed with words onely, the Lord also approoued it by deed. For in the very moment that he rose againe, he vouchsafed to haue many of the holy men to rise againe in company with him, and made them to bee seene in the Citie: so giuing an assured token, that whatsoeuer he did and suffered for the purchasing of eternall saluation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithfull of the old Testament, than vnto vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued with the same spirit of faith, wherby we are regenerate into life. Now when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparkle of immortalitye, wherupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is so much the more maruell, that in the old time the Sadduces fell to such grossenes of error, that they denied both the resurrection and also the substance of soules, both which points they saw sealed with so cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no lesse to be maruailed at, euen at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdome of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should haue that punishment for refusing the Gospell. For so it behooued, by the iust iudgement of God, to strike those minds with blindnes, which in refusing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themselves into darkenes. Therefore they read and continually turne ouer Moses, but they are stopped with a veile set betwene them and him, that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shall it remaine couered and hidden from them, till he be turned to Christ, from whom now they trauaile to lead and draw him away so much as in them lieth.

with them: seeing Christ hath risen vnto life accompanied with many of them, and hath witnessed by Peter, that the spirit of faith which is in vs, was also in them: howsoever the Sadduces haue denied the heauenly, and the Jewes at this day doe expect an earthly kingdome, we may not take from the Fathers the inheritance of eternall life.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

What then wilt thou say: shall there be no difference left betwene the olde Testament and the New? and to what purpose serue all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrarie? I doe willingly allow those differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the vnicie already established, as it shall be plaine to see when we shall haue intreated of them in order. Those differences are (as farre as euer I could marke or can remember) chiefly foure in number, to the which if you list to adioyne the fifth, I am not against it. I say and trust to prooue that they are all such as rather belong to the manner of ministation, than to the substance of them. And by this meane they shall nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the old and new Testament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, euen in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raised vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gaue it to bee seene or rather to bee tasted of, vnder earthly benefites: but nowe hauing reuealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospell, he more clearly and plainly directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferior manner of exercising which he vsed with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any higher than to the good things promised to the bodie. They so often heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods lawe. They heare that God threateneth nothing more seuerely to the transgressors of the same lawe, than that they shall be driuen out of the possession of the same land, and scattered abroad into strange regions. They see that in a manner to this effect come all the blessings & curses that are pronounced by Moses. Hereby they do vndoubtedly determine, that the Iewes not for their own sakes, but for others, were seuered frō other nations, that is, that the church of Christ might haue an image, in whose outward forme she might see examples of spirituall things. But such the scripture doth sometimes shew, that God himselfe directed all the earthly benefits that he did for them to this end, that so he might lead the by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefits: was too much vnskillfulnes, I wil not say blockishnes, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our contouersie with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of the land of Chanaan was to the Israelites their chiefe & last blessing, and that to vs after the reucaling of Christ, it doth but figuratiuely signifie the heavenly inheritance. On the other side we affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enioyed, as in a looking glasse beholde the inheritance to come which they beleueed to be prepared for them in heauen.

2 That shall better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galathians. He compareth the nation of the Iewes to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himselfe followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolmaster, to whose custodie he is committed. And whereas he applyeth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindreth but that it may also verie fitly serue to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacitie to enter vpon and vse. The same church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lord kept them vnder this schooling, that he gaue them not the spirituall promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posteritie vnto hope of immortalitie, he promised them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirme themselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceiued, there was giuen them a higher promise to testify that that land was not the highest benefit of God. So Abraham was not suffred to lie slothfull in the promise receiued of the land, but his mind was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this said vnto him: I am thy protector, and thy reward exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transitorie and slippery reward in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adioineth the promise of the land to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their own sayings do declare. So Dauid riseth vpward from temporall blessings, to that same highest and last blessing. My hart (saith he) and my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, the Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that sauest mine heritage for me. Againe, I haue cried vnto thee, O Lord, I haue saide, I thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the liuing. Truly they that dare so speake, doe without doubt possess that with their hope they climbe about the worlde, and all the good things here present. But the Prophets do oft describe this blessednesse of the worlde to come, under the figure that they had receiued of the Lorde. And so are these sayings to be vnderstanded. That the godly shall possess the land by inheritance, and the wicked shall be destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kinde of riches, and Sion ouerflow with plentie of all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true cōuntry of the faithfull, and that heauenly citie wherein the Lorde hath commaunded blessing and life for euer.

Iob. 18. 17.
Psal. 133. 3.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the olde testament did cōtinue the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is nowe meete to do. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to minde, what markes of his grace the Lorde had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the small rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetenes of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as the Lord in testifying his good will to ward the faithfull, by present good things, did as in shadowe expresse the spirituall felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his iudgement against the reprobate. Therefore as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the vnskillfull do not weye this comparion or agreement, as I may call it betwene the punishments and the rewards, they maruell at so much alteration in god, that in old time was so sodenly readie to take vengeance on eury offence of man with sterne and horrible punishments, and nowe as if he had laide away the affection of his old angines, he punisheth both much more gently & seldomer, yea, & for the same cause they do almost imagine seuerall gods of the old and new testament: which the Manichees did in deed. But we shall easily be deliuered from such doubts, if we lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set foorth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporall benefits, and the greuousnesse of the spirituall death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yea after a certaine manner did vp.

Gods figuring of heauenly by earthly blessednes in the olde lawe is the cause, why when his temporall benefits doe seeme to haue bene more strict to the righteous & his punishments more greuous then now.

4 Another difference of the old and new testament is said to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew onely an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in stead of the body. But the new testament giueth the truth present, and the sounde body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly whersoever the newe testament is in comparion set against the olde: but it is more largely entreated of in the Epistle to the Hebrues than any where else. There the apostle disputeth against them, which thought that the obseruatiō of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they should also drawe with them the ruine of religion. To confute this error, hee vseth that which had bene forespoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthood of Christ. For whereas there is giuen him an eternal priesthood, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, wherein new successors were daily put in, one after another. But he proueth that the institution of this newe priesthood is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an oth. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthood, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, he proueth by this reason: for that the weakenesse of the law was such that it could helpe nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakenes, euen this, that it had certaine outward righteousness of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beastes, it could neither wipe away sinnes, nor purchase true holinesse. He concludeth therefore that there was in it a shadowe of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the things themselves: and that therefore it had no other office, but to bee as an introduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospel. Here is to be seen, in what point the covenant of the

The seconde difference betweene the two testaments is, that the newe doth exhibite that foundation of the covenant which the old did teach them to expect.

Psal. 100. 10.

Heb. 7. 11. & 19.
& 9. 9. & 10. 1.

law is compared with the covenant of the Gospell, and the ministry of Christ, with the ministrie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two testaments: but sith the point of our case leadeth vs another way, we must tend to this end, to finde out the truth. Let vs then set fourth heere the covenant which hee hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment therof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to bee as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Now thus came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to giue place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed onely accidents, or verily additions and things adioined, or (as the people call them) accessarie things to the covenant, yet because they were instruments or meanes of the administration thereof, they beare the name of the covenant it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in summe: the old Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the covenant, conteined in ceremonies and sacrifices. The apostle saith, that because in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behooued that they shoulde be discontinued and abrogate that place might be giuen to Christ the assure and mediator of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or if you like it better, thus: That the olde testament of the Lorde was that which was deliuered, wrapped vp in the shadowish and effectuall obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspense vntill it might staie vpon a more stedfast and substantiall confirmation: and that then onely it was made newe and eternall, after that it was consecrate and stablished by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gaue at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new Testament in his blood: to signifie that then the testament of God attaineth his truth: by which it becommeth new and eternall, when it is sealed with his blood.

Matt. 26. 20.

The kingdome is nowe manifested which in former times was darklie beheld.

Gal. 3. 24 & 4.

5 Hereby appeereth in what sense the Apostle said: that in the schooling of the law, the Iewes were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And hee confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolemaister. For it behooued, that ere the sonne of righteousnesse was yet risen, there shoulde neither be so great brightnesse of reuelation, nor so great deepe sight of vnderstanding. Therefore God so gaue them in measure the light of his worde, that they sawe it as yet farre off and darkely. Therefore Paul expresth this slendernes of vnderstanding by the tearme of young age, which the Lordes will was to haue to be exercised with the elements of this worlde and with outward obseruations, as rules of instruction for children vntil Christ should shine abroad, by whom it behooued that the knowledge of the faithfull people should grow to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe ment of, when he said, that the law and the prophets were vntil Iohn, and that from thence forth the kingdome of God is preached. What did the law and the Prophets open to men of their time? euen this, they gaue a taste of that wisdome which in time to come should be plainly disclosed: and they shewed it before as it were twinklingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Christ might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdome of God set open. For in him are laid abroad the treasures of all wisdome and vnderstanding, whereby we attaine, euen in a maner, into the secret closets of heauen.

Matt. 11. 13.

Col. 1. 9.

The Prophets themselves did not so cleerely knowe Christ, but that

6 And it maketh not against vs, that there can scarcely any one be found in the christian Church, that in excellencie of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophets excelled in such force of spirite, that euen at this day they lighten the

the whole worldewithall. For our question is not heere, what grace the Lorde hath bestowed vpon a few, but what ordinarie disposition he vsed in teaching his people: such as is declared in the Prophets themselues, which were endued with peculiar knowledge aboue the rest. For euen their preaching is darke and enclosed in figures, as of things a far off. Moreouer how maruellous knowledge soeuer appeared in them about other, yet forasmuch as they were driuen of necessity to submit them to the common childish instruction of the people, they themselues also were reckoned in number of children. Finally, there neuer chaunced any such cleere sight to any at that time, but that it did in some part fauour of the darkenesse of the time. Whereupon Christ said, Many kings and Prophets haue desired to see the things that ye see, and haue not seene them: and to heare the things that ye heare, and haue not heard them. Therefore blessed are your eies, because they see, and your eares because they heare. And truely it is meete that the presence of Christ should haue this excellency of prerogatiue, that from it should arise the cleere reuealing of the heauenly mysteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which euen we nowe alleaged out of the first Epistle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their trauell was profitable, principally for our age.

euen in them there appeareth a difference betwene those times and these.

Mat. 13. 17. Luk. 10. 24.

1. Pet. 1. 12.

7 Nowe I come to the thirde difference, which is taken out of Jeremie, whose wordes are these: Behold the day shall come, saith the Lorde, and I will make a new couenant with the house of Israel, and the house of Juda, not according to the couenant that I made with your Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hande, to lead them out of the lande of Aegypt, the couenant that they made voide although I ruled ouer them: But this shall be the couenant that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their harts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquitie. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they shall all know me, from the least vnto the most. Of which words the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison betweene the law and the Gospell, that he called the law a literall, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, he said, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in harts: that the lawe was the preaching of death, the Gospell the preaching of life: the lawe the preaching of damnation, the Gospell the preaching of rightcouinesse: that the lawe is made voide, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that we weigh the wordes of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some vnlikenesse betweene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doth: and that not in simple respect of the lawe, but because there were certaine naughty men, hauing a wrong zeale to the lawe, which did with peruerse loue of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the lawe, according to their error and foolish affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they do by comparison set the olde and the new Testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The lawe doth commonly in euery place conteine promises of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elsewhere, therefore they are not reckoned as part of the lawe, when the meere nature of the lawe is spoken of. The onely thing they ascribe vnto it, to command things that are right, and to forbid wicked domgs: to promise rewards to the followers of rightcouinesse, and to threaten punishment to the transgressors: but in the meane time neither to change nor amend the perversenesse of hart, that is naturally in all men.

Ier. 31. 31.

The third difference betwene the old couenant and the new, mentioned by the apostle out of Jeremie.

1. Cor. 2. 6.

8 Now let vs expound the Apostles comparison, one piece after another. The old Testament is literall, because it was published without the effectuall working of the spirite: The new is spirituall which the Lord hath spirituallly grauen in the harts of

The severall branches of the third difference betwene the two Testaments.

of men: Therefore the second diuersitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can doe nothing but wrap all mankind within the curse: The new is the instrument of life, because it deliuereth from curse, and restoreth into fauour with God. The olde is the ministerie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vnrightheadnesse: The new is the ministerie of righteousnesse, because it reuealeth the mercie of God, by which we are made righteous. The last diuersitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the old testament had an image of things absent, it behooued that it should in time decay & vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giueth the true bodie in deede, keepeth still a firme and perpetuall steadfastnesse. Ieremie indeed calleth euen the morall law, a weake and fraile covenant: but that is for another reason, because by the sudden falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by and by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cannot properly be laid vpon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weaknesse were dissolved by the coming of Christ, had the cause of their weaknesse within themselues. Nowe, that difference of the letter and spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Iewes without any fruit at all, hauing none of them conuerted vnto him. But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduance the abundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a new personage, did honorably set forth the preaching of the Gospell. For if we reckon vp the multitude of them whom the Lord out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospell regenerate with his spirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, we shall say, that there were very fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israel, that with affection of minde and entirely from their hart embraced the covenant of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

The fourth difference, the one held the conscience in thraldom & feare, the other giueth libertie and ioy.
Rom. 8. 15.
Heb. 12. 18.

9 Out of the thirde difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the old Testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens minds: but the newe Testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and assurednesse. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romanes. Yee haue not received the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirite of adoption, by which we erie Abba father. Hereunto Ieueth that in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that the faithfull are not nowe come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlewinde, darkenesse and tempest, where nothing can bee heard or seene but that striketh mens mindes with terrour, in so much that Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they all besought, that they might not heare: But that we are come to the Mount Sion, and the citie of the liuing God, the heavenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that we haue alleaged out of the Epistle to the Romanes, hee setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galathians, when hee maketh an allegorie of the two sonnes of Abraham, after this manner, that Agar the bond woman is a figure of the Mount Sinai, where the people of Israel received the lawe: Sara the free woman is a figure of the heavenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which may neuer come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the law we are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospell onely we are regenerate into freedome. But the summe commeth to this effect that the olde Testament did strike into consciences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made ioyfull. The olde did holde consciences bounde vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Israel they obiect against vs the holy fathers, who sith it is euident, that they were endued with the same spirite that wee are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfsame freedome and ioy.

Gal. 4. 21.

We answered, that neither of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themselves by the lawe to be both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with vniquietnesse of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospell, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruite of the new Testament, that beside the common law of the old testament they were exempted from these euils. Moreouer, we will denie that they were so endued with the spirit of freedome and assurednesse, that they did not in some part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howsoeuer they enioyed that prerogatiue which they had obtained by grace of the Gospell, yet were they subiect to the same bonds and burdens of obseruation, that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to the careful keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like vnto bondage, and the hand-writings whereby they confessed themselves guiltie of sinne, did not discharge them from being bond: it may rightfully be said, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while we haue respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vsed with the people of Israel.

10 The three last comparisons that we haue recited, are of the lawe and the Gospell. Wherefore in them by the name of the Olde Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospell. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckoned vnder the name of the old testament, therein he thought verie well, and meant euen the same thing that we do now teach, for he had regard to those sayings of Hieremie and Paul, where the olde testament is seuered from the word of mercie and grace. And this also he verie aptly adioyneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through loue haue obeyed the commandements, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the New testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthlie and temporall, but spirituall, heauenlie, and eternall good things, principallie beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not ministred vnto them, both to do good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Saines whome the Scripture rehearseth to haue bene from the beginning of the world chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betweene our diuision and Augustines: that ours (according to that saying of Christ: The lawe and the Prophets were vnto Iohn: from thence forth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction betweene the cleerenesse of the Gospell, and the darker distribution of the word that went before: and Augustine doth onely seuer the weaknesse of the law from the strength of the Gospell. And heere also is to be noted concerning the holie fathers, that they so liued vnder the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and embraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursions: which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outward sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though he were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities do they fall, that sticke fast in the obseruations of the law without respect of Christ.

11 The fifth difference that we may adde, lieth in this: that vntill the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe seuerall the covenant of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he diuided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fel to his possession: Iacob the cord of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people : Beholde the heauen and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy Gods. He cleaued onely to thy fathers, he loued them to choose their seede after them, euen your selues out of all nations. Therefore he vouchsafed to graunt the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they onely of all men belonged vnto him : he laide his couenant as it were in their bosome : to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatiues. But (to omit the rest of his benefices, and speake that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to doe with him : neither did he to helpe their destruction, giue them that which was onely the remedie, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sonne that was his darling, other were strangers : Israel was knowne to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse : Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane : Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nigh vnto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was deliuered indeede, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercie of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were farre off, euen as to them that were neere adioyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might growe into one people. Wherefore, now there is no respect of Greece or Iew, circumcision or vncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whome the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniuersally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the riuers to the vttermost endes of the world.

The last three differences are meane of the law, seuered from those intermingled promises of grace and mercie; the first including them: whereunto Saint Augustine though he seeme notwithstanding is not repugnant.

Mat. 15. 24.

12 Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is cleerely shewed the excellencie of the new Testament about the olde. It had in deede bene before testified by many, and most plaine oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still deferred vnto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not procede vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but deferred it so long vntill that all the parts of our redemption being performed, and the time of his abatement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is about all names : before whom all knees should bow. For which cause when this conuenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Chanaan, that he was not lent but to the lost sheepe of the house of Israel. And he suffered not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye (saith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the lost sheepe of the house of Israel. But how soeuer it was before vttered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to begin it, it seemed so newe and straunge a thing vnto them, that they were affraide of it, as of some monster. Truly very fearefully and not without sticking at it they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lorde which by so many ages had chosen out Israel from all other nations, should now vndoe that choise, as it were suddenly changing his purpose. It was indeede spoken off afore by prophecies : but they could not giue so great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing moued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lorde had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that shoulde one day come to passe, were not sufficient to moue them. For beside this that hee had called very fewe, hee did after a certaine manner ingrasse them into the household of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as par cell of them : but by this generall calling, the Gentiles were not only made equall with the Iewes, but alio it appeared that they came into the place of the Iewes, that were become dead. And yet all those strangers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made equall with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll his myserie hidden from ages and generations, and which he also saith to be maruellous to the verie Angels, Col. 1. 16.

13 In these foure or five points, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set foorth the whole difference of the old and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this varietie in gouerning the Church, this diuerse manner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe foorth to other things. And that may be done shortly, because the obiections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alway stedfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as afterward to disallow the same thing, which he had before both commaunded and commended. I answer that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied diuerse formes to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expedient for euery one. If the husbandman appoint to his household one sort of businesse in winter, and another in sommer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swaructh from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continuall order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household do instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childehoode, of another in youth, and of another in mans state, we cannot therefore say that he is fickle and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore do we charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath seuered the diuersitie of times, with fit and agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Iewes like vnto children and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this gouernement of God that he helde them in their childish lessons, which according to the capacite of their age were fit for them, and instructed vs with stronger and as it were more manly discipline. Therefore herein appeareth the constancy of God, that he taught one selfe same doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commaunded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forme and manner thereof, in that he shewed not himselfe subiect to change: but so faire he tempered himselfe to the capacite of man, which is diuers and changeable.

These alterations not vnnecessary but expedient for the Church.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diuersity, but because God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the comming of Christ, reueale the eternall life in plaine words without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacraments and easie to perceiue, giue his holie spirit, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is euen like as if they should quarrell with God for that he hath created the world so late, sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his will was to haue enterechanged courses betweene winter and sommer, betweene day and night. But as for vs, euen as all godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubt that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to haue bene done. For that were to take presumptuously too much vpon vs, not to giue God leaue to haue the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (say they): that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beasts, and all that furniture of the Leuitical priesthood, wherewith in the old time he was delighted: As though these outward and transitorie things did delite God, or any way moue affection in him. We haue already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of man. If a Phisition do heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, and afterward do vse another maner of healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same,

God may diuersifie deale with his Church & people vpon causes kept secret vnto himselfe, neither may we without inolerable presumption carp & quarrell at his manner of dealing.

Cap. 12. Of the knowledge of he hath consideration of age? So behooued it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by another sort, be before shewed that hee was to come: and it is meete that now being already deliuered, he be represented by other signes. But concerning Gods calling, now at the coming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy Ghost more plentifully powred out: who, I pray you, can denie it to be right, that God haue in his owne hand and will the disposing of his owne graces, to giue light to what nations it pleased him? to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to giue what doctrine and how great profiting and successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulnesse? and againe when he wil to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therefore, that the cauellations are too much vnmee, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make them call either the righteoufnesse of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

The xij. Chapter.

That it behooued, that Christ, to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

It was necessary that he which should vnseuerably ioyne man so God, should himselfe be both.

NOW it much behooued vs that he should be both God & man, which should be our Mediator. If a man aske of the necessitie, it was not indeede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceedeth from the heauenly decreed, whereupon hanged all the saluation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud betweene him and vs, and vterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attaine vnto God. But who could haue attained vnto him? could any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shun the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and vnseuerably cleaue vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very maiestie of God would descend vnto vs, for we could not ascende vnto it. So it behooued that the son of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither could the neerenesse be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betweene our filthinesse, and the most pure cleannesse of God. Although man had stood vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediator. What could he then doe being plunged downe into death and hell with deadly fall, defiled with so many spots, sinking with his owne corruption, and ouerwhelmed with all accusednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set foorth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (saith he) of God and man, the man Iesus Christ. He might haue said, God: or at the least he might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knew our weaknesse: therefore to prouide for it in time, he vsed a most fit remedie, setting among vs the sonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, he putterh vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea so neere that he toucheth vs, for as much as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there euen the same thing that in another place is set out with moe wordes: that we haue not a bishop that cannot haue compassion of our infirmites, for as much as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

God, a mediator.*

1. Tim. 2. 3.

Heb. 4. 15.

2 That shall also appeare more plainly, if we consider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, so to restore vs into the fauour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hell, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could do that, vnlesse the sonne of God were made also the sonne of man, and so take ours vpon him to conuey his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earnest we truit, that we are the children of God, because the naturall sonne of God hath shapen for himselfe a bodie of our bodie, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. He disdaind not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himselfe, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of GOD and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhoode which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he saith: I go vp to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen assured vnto vs: for that the onely son of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: because if we be brethren, than are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same cause very profitable, that he which should be our redeemer, should be both very God and verie man. It was his office to swallow vp death: who could doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to overcome sin: who could do that but righteoulesse it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the world and of the aire: who could do that but a power aboue both world and aire? Now in whose possession is life, or righteoulesse, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onely begotten son, made himselfe our redeemer, when his will was to haue vs redeemed.

3 Another principall point of our reconciliation with God was this, that man which had lost himselfe by his disobedience, should for remedy set obedience against it, should satisfie the iudgement of God, and pay the penaltie of sin. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his steed in obeying his father, to yeeld our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the iust iudgement of God, and in the same flesh suffer the paine that we had deserued. For as much as therefore neither being onely God, he could feele death, nor being onely man he could overcome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one subject to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wraffle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore, that spoile Christ either for his godhead or for his manhoode, do indeede either diminish his maiestie and glorie, or obscure his goodnes: but on the other side they do no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they do thereby weaken and ouerthrow, which cannot stand but resting vpon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and David, which God had promised in the law and the Prophets. Wherby the godly mindes do gather this other fruite, that being by the verie course of his pedigree brought to David and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I euen now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature betweene him and vs is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death and sin together, that the victorie so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he receiued of vs, that hauing made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltines, and appease the iust wrath of his father.

4 He that shall be diligently heedfull in considering these things as he ought, will easily neglect these wandring speculations that rauish vnto them light spirits

The sonne of God becoming man, hath confirmed vs in the state of being sonnes to the same father, and hauing right to the same inheritance with him: & being God hath suffered death, conquered sin, subdued powers, and bestowed life, which els he could not haue done.

and desirous of nouelties: of which sort is, that Christ should haue beene man, although there had been no need of remedie to redeeme mankind. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vn corrupted, he was set as head ouer Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But sith all the scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or end. To what ende Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well ynough known: euen to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore vnder the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God would be mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euen when the lawe was not yet published, the Mediator was neuer promised without blood: we gather that he was appointed by the eternall counsell of God to purge the filthines of men, for that the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of *Esai*e shall suffice vs for all, where he foretelleth, that he shal be stricken with the hand of God for the finnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be vpon him: and that he should be a priest that should offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his woundes should come health to other: and that, because all haue strayed and been scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, whosoever passeth beyonde these bounds, he doeth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himselfe was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his coming to appease God, and gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So John before that he teacheth that the Word was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne, that whosoever beleueth in him should not perishe, but haue euerlasting life. Againe: The hour is come that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, and they that heare it, shall lue. I am the resurrection and life: he that beleueth in me, although he be dead, shal lue. Againe, The sonne of man cometh to saue that which was lost. Againe: The whole need not a Phisition. I should neuer make an end, if I should rehearse all. The Apostles do all with one consent cal vs to this fountaine. And truly if he had not come to reconcile God, the honour of the priesthoode should haue come to nought. For as much as the priest appointed meane betweene God and man to make intercession: and he should not be our rightcousnes, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute finnes vnto vs. Finally, he should be spoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paul should prooue vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, God hath sent his owne sonne, that in likenes of the flesh of sin he should satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the goodnes of God and his infinite goodnes toward men, when Christ was giuen to be the redeemer. Finally, the Scripture euerie where assigneth no other end why the sonne of God would take vpon him our flesh, and also receiued this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father toward vs. So it is written, and so it behooued that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loueth me, because I giue my life for the sheepe, this commandement he gaue me. As Mosis lifted vp the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place: Father, saue me from this houre. But I am therefore come euen to this houre. Father, glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the ende why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sort doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise giuen to the fathers, to giue light to them that sat in the shadowe of death. Let vs remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in another place testifieth, that all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden, and beside whom he gloryeth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things prouue the contrarie, burth that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned might also in putting on their flesh testifie his loue toward them, being preferred and safe. The answer is short, that forasmuch as the holie Ghost pronounceth, that by the eternal decree of God these two things were ioyned together, that Christ shoulde be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawfull for vs to search any further. For whosoever is tickled with desire to know any more, hee being not contented with the vchangeable ordiuance of God, doth shewe also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was giuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth to what end he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predestination, he verie fidly represseth all wantonnesse and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloued sonne, in whom we haue redemption by his blood. Truly heere is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to helpe the miserie of mankinde. If the aduersarie object againe, that this purpose of God did hang vpon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say that they with wicked boldnes breake foorth to faime them a new Christ, whosocuer snffer themselves to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ then God hath foreappointed them by his secret decree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirit of vnderstanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, bredth, & depth, euen the loue of Christ that surmounteth all knowledge: euen as if of purpose hee woulde set barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it neuer so little, swaue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sith this is a faithfull saying (as Paul testifieth) that Christ is come to saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospell, was giuen vs in Christ before the times of the worlde: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Against this modestie Osiander carpeeth vniuilly which hath againe in this time unhappily surred this question before lightly mouued by a few. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the sonne of God should not haue appeered in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this inuention is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture. As though Paul did not bridle forward curiositie, when after he had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, he by and by commandeth to auoid foolish questions. The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly coueted to seeme witty, they mouued this question, whether the sonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Assie. This monstrousnesse which all the godly doe worthilie abhorre as detestable, let Osiander confute with this pretense, that it is neuer expresse confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paul accompteth nothing precious or worthie to be knownen, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Assie to be the authour of saluation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth that Christ by the eternall counsell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather all things together, will neuer the more acknowledge another that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

Cap. 12. Of the knowledge of

A vaine principle whereupon Oslander gathereth, that although Adam had neuer sinned, Christ verily had bene made man.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashioned after the patterne of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to cloth with our flesh. Whereupon he gathereth, that if Adam had neuer fallen from his first and vncorrupted originall state, yet Christ should haue bene man. How trifling this is and wrested, all men that haue found iudgement, doe easily perceiue of themselves. In the meane time first he thinketh that he hath seene what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not onely shine in those excellent gifts wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I graunt that Adam did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true and highest perfection of dignitie) yet I say, that the likenesse of God is no where else to be sought, but in those marks of excellency wherewith he had garnished Adam aboute other liuing creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men doe graunt with one consent, and therefore that whatsoeuer excellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approached to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to haue his glory seene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he aduanced by the benefite of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same son was a common head as well to Angels as to men, so that the same dignitie that was bestowed vpon man, did also belong vnto Angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to deny, that there is something in them wherein they resemble their father. Now if his will was to haue his glory to be represented as well in Angels as in men, and to be seene in both natures, Oslander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behinde men, because they did not beare the image of Christ. For they could not continually enioy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleaue together vnder one head. Finally, if we beleuee Christ, this shall be our last felicitie, to be made of like fowme to the Angels, when we shall be receiued vp into heauen. But if Oslander will conclude, that the originall patterne of the image of God was in Christ as he is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needs haue bene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth also to them.

Gen. 1. 27.

Gal. 3. 10.

The rest of Oslanders reasons answered.

7 Therefore, Oslander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a liar, vnlesse it had bene first stedfastly and vchangeable decreed in his minde, to haue his sonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he should with the Angels haue bene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore haue bene necessary, that the sonne of God should be made either man or Angell. And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the vchangeable counsell of God had bene before the creation of man that Christ should be borne, not as the redeemer but as the first man, he should haue lost his prerogative: for as much as now hee should be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is to restore mankinde being lost, and so it might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should he to much abhor that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that he was made like vnto vs in all things, except sinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to reckon him the first of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine know why Paul calleth Christ the second Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should haue been called the first Adam. Oslander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was already before knowen man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same patterne. But Paul in naming him the second second Adam, setteth meane betweene the first beginning of man and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to haue nature restored to his first degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the Sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander reasoneth ill and vsauourily, that Adam, so long as he had stand without falling, should haue bene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answere by the contrary, bicause though the Sonne of God had neuer put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body & in the soule of man should haue shined the image of God, in the bright beaines wherof it alway appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the fouraigne supremacie in all. And so is that foolish subteltie assailed, which Osiander bloweth abroad, that the Angels should haue lacked this head, vnlesse it had bene purposed by God to cloth his Sonne with flesh, yea, though there had bene no fault of Adam. For he doth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath no supremacie ouer Angels, that they should haue him for their Prince, but inasmuch as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the wordes of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures, nor that he is create, or ought to be reckoned among creatures: but because the state of the world in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beautie, had no other originall: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For the Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all things were create by the Sonne, that he might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might begin to be the Redcemer. Of like ignorance is it that he saith, that men should nor haue had Christ to their King, if hee had not bene man. As though the kingdome of God could not stande, if the eternall Sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the fellowship of his heauenly glory and life, should himselfe beare the fouraignerie. But in this false principle hee is alway deceiued, or rather deceiuech himselfe, that the Church should haue bene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, euen as the Angels enioyed him their head, he could not likewise by his diuine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirit quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enioy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Osiander accounteth for most strong oracles: euen so as being drunke with the sweetnesse of his owne speculations, he vseth to blow out fond Eacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he saith is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this now is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But how proueth he that to be a prophecie? Because in Matthew Christ giueth the same saying to God. As though that whatsoeuer God hath spoken by men, containeth some prophecie. Let Osiander seeke prophecies in euery Commandement of the Law, which, it is certaine to haue come from GOD the Author of them. Beside that, Christ should haue bene grosse and earthly, if hee had rested vpon the literall sence. Because he speaketh not of the mysticall vnion whereunto he hath vouchsafed to receiue his Church, but onely of faithfulnesse betweene man and wife: for this cause hereacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shall be one flesh, that no man should attempt to breake that insoluble knot by diuorce. If Osiander loath this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his disciples further to a mysterie, in more subtely expounding the saying of his Father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his error, which after he had said that we are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great mysterie, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure and similitude of marriage to set forth the holy coupling together, that maketh vs one with Christ. And so doe the words sound. Because when he giueth warning that he speaketh this of Christ and his Church, he doth as it were by way of correction, sever the spirituall ioyning of Christ and his Church from the lawe of marriage. Wherefore this sickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I thinke I neede no more to shake vp any more of that sort of chaffe, because the vanitie of them all is soone found out by this short confutation. But this sobrietye shall abound the suffice to feede soundly the children of God: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That Christ tooke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

The truth of Christ's humane nature proved against the Manichees and Marcionites.

Now, vnlesse I be deceiued, it were superfluous to entreate againe of the Godhead of Christ, which hath alreadie in another place bene proued with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seene, how he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The truth of his humane nature hath in the old time bene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whome, the Marcionites fained a ghost in steede of the body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heauenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture do stand against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heauenly seede, nor in the counterfeit shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Jacob. Neither is the eternall throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the sonne of Dauid, and to the fruite of his womb. Therefore being deliuered in the flesh, he is called the sonne of Dauid and Abraham: not because he is only borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seede of Dauid: as in another place the Apostle teacheth, that he descended of the Jewes. For which cause the Lord himselfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himselfe the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plainly that he was man truly issued of the seede of mankinde. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many meanes, with so great diligence and simplicitie declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who would haue thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet wee haue other testimonies at hand, if we listed to heape vp more of them. As is that saying of Paul: that God sent his sonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subiect to hunger, thirst, colde, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be chosen, that may most auaille to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gaue not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him but tooke our nature, that in flesh and blood he might, by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Again, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Again, that he ought to haue bin made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made mercifull & faithfull intercessor: that we haue not a bishop that cannot be compatient of our infirmities, and such like. And for the same purpose serueth that which we touched a little before, that it behooued that the finnes of the world should be cleansed in our flesh, which Paul plainly affirmeth. And truly, what so euer the father hath giuen to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to vs, because he is the head, from which the whole bodie being knit together, groweth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is saide: that the Spirit was giuen him without measure, that all we should draw of the fulnesse thereof. For as much as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidentall gift. And for this cause Christ saith in another place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them.

2 As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their error, they doe too vnaptly wrest them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling subtleties, when they goe about to wipe away those things that I haue alleaged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastlicke body in steede of a true bodie: because in some places it is said, that he was made after the likenesse of a man, and that he was found in shape as a man. But so he nothing weigheth what is Pauls purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ tooke vpon him, but that whereas he might haue shewed forth his Godhead, he made no other shew of himselfe, but as of an abiect and vnregarded man. For, to exhort vs by his example to submission, he sheweth that forasmuch as he was God, he might haue by and by set forth his glory to be seene to the world: but yet that he gaue ouer some of his owne right, and of his owne accord abased himselfe, because he did put on the image of a seruant and contented with that humilitie, suffred his Godhead to be hidden with the veile of the flesh. Hee doth not here teach what Christ was, but how he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the text it is easlie gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in shape he was found as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not shine forth, but onely the shape of man appeared in base and abiect estate? For otherwise that place of Peter could not stand together, that he was dead in the flesh, but quickened in the spirite, if the Sonne of God had not bene weake in the nature of man: which Paul expresth more plainly in saying, that he suffred by reason of the weakenesse of the flesh. And hereunto seruenh the exaltation: because it is exprefly said, that Christ attained a new glory after that he abased himselfe, which could not well agree to be spoken of any, but of a man hauing flesh and Soule. Manichees framed Christ a body of aire, because Christ is called the second Adam, heauenly of heauen. But neither in that place doth the Apostle bring in a heauenly essence of the bodie, but a spirituall force which being powered abroad by Christ, doth quicken vs. Now, as we haue already scene, Peter and Paul doe seuer the same from his flesh. But rather that doctrine which is receiued among the true teachers, concerning the flesh of Christ, is very well prooued by that place. For if Christ had not all one nature of body with vs, it were a very vaine argument, that Paul with such vehemencie followeth: that if Christ be risen againe, we shall also rise againe: and if we doe not rise, then that Christ also is not risen. By what cauillations so euer either the olde Manichees or their new Disciples goe about to escape, they shall not winde themselues away. It is a soule shift, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sonne of man, insomuch as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, very man indeede is called the sonne of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne toong. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to bee vnderstande by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shall be sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindedfull of him, or the sonne of man that thou visitest him? In this figure is exprefied the true manhood of Christ. For though he were not immediatly begotten of a mortall father, yet his race came from Adam. For else that place could not stand which we haue already alleaged that Christ is made partaker of flesh and blood, that he might gather to him yoong children to the seruice of God. In which words it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning Heb. 2. 14. also he saith, that both the Author of holinesse and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is prooued by the processe of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowship of nature: because he by and by addeth. Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if he had said before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignitie, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioine himselfe to the base and vnnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they object, that by this meane the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because we know that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely flesh maketh not a brotherly ioyning. But although the Apostle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when we say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meane which spiritually graffeth vs into the bodie of Christ. Also they foolishly moue a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ should haue beene borne of Adam straight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellencie of power. And more colour hath that which they babbe, that Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankind into fauour. For, to set out more largely the honour which God vouchsafed to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe set behind vs And if the testimony of Moses be wel vsied, where he saith that the seede of the woman shall breake the serpents head, it shall vtterly end the controuersie. For onely Christ is not there spoken of, but al mankind. Because the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, he generally pronounceth that the posteritie of the woman should get the vpper hand of the duell. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankind, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Eue, whom he spake vnto with good hope, that she should not faint with sorrow.

3 They do no lesse wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seede of Abraham, and the fruite of the wombe of Dauid. For if the name of Seede had been spoken in an allegorie, truly Paul would not haue left it vtold, where he plainly and without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sonnes of Abraham redeemers, but one Christ. Of like sort is it that they alledge that he is no otherwise called the son of Dauid, but because he was promised & at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the son of God: in that he by and by addeth, According to the flesh, he truly meanneth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, hee saith severally beside, that according to the flesh he descended of the Iewes. Now if he were not truly begotten of the seede of Dauid, to what purpose shall be this saying, that he is the fruite of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loynes shall he descende, that shall abide in thy seate. Now in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Matthew, they doe sophistically mocke. For though he do not rehearse the parents of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowen abroad among the people, he reckoneth it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the seede of Dauid, when it was well knowen that Marie was of the same stocke. But Luke more expresth them in teaching that saluacion brought by Christ, is common to all mankind: because Christ the author of saluacion proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I graunt in deede, that by the Genealogie it can none other wise be gathered that Christ was the sonne of Dauid, but in so much as he was begotten of the Virgine. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly, in this that to prooue that Christ tooke his body of nothing, they as-firmeth that women are seedles, and so they ouerthrow the principles of nature. But because that is no question of diuinitie, & the reasons that they bring are so fickle that they may verie easily be confuted: therefore I will not touch those things that belong they alleadge out of Scripture : that is , that Aaron and Isidab tookewiues of the tribe of Iehudab, and so the difference of tribes had then been confounded; if woman had engendering seed in her. But it is well enough known that as touching ciuill order, the kindreds are reckoned by the feede of the man , and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man aboute woman proueth not the contrarie , but that in generation the feede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men only; shall we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But very children doe know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this sort is saide, that women bring forth to their husbandes, because the name of the household alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnnoble, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in the state of bondage the issue followeth the wombe, according to the iudgement of the Ciuill lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is ingendred of the seed of the woman. And it hath of long time bin receiued in common vse of all nations, that the mothers are called Genetresses, that is engenders. Wherwith Gods law also agreeth, which else should wrongfully forbid the marriage of the vnle with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betweene them : and also it were lawfull for a man to marrie his sister by the mothers side, so that she were begotten of another father. But as I grant that there is a passiuie power ascribed to women, so do I answer that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not saide to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie shaking off all shame do too lightly aske, whether we will say that Christ was engendred of the mensuall feede of the Virgin, for I will likewise aske of them, whether he did not congeale in the bloud of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthews wordes, that because Christ was begotten of Marie, he was engendred of her seed: as a like engendring is ment when it is saide, that Eoore was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he seuereth this manuellous manner of generation from the common manner, for that by her was Christ begotten of the feede of Dauid. For euen in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Ioseph of Iacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Euangelist so frameth the order of his speech, and willing to prouue that Christ came of Dauid, is contented with this one reason, that hee was begotten of Marie. Whereby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Marie was of kinne to Ioseph.

Gal. 4. 4.

Math. 1. 5.

4. The absurdities wherewith they would charge vs, are stuffed full of childish cauations. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he should haue taken his originall of men: because he so could not be exempt from the vniuersall lawe that enloseth all the offspring of Adam without exception vnder sinne. But the comparison that we reade in Paul doth easily assoile this doubt: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnes of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeth another comparison of his: the first Adam of earth earthly, and naturall; the second of heauen heavenly. Therefore in another place, the same Apostle, where he teacheth that Christ was sent in the likenesse of sinfull flesh to sauishe the law, doth so expressly seuer him from the common estate of men, that he be verie man without fault and corruption: But very childishly they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secret working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seed of Marie, then is not the womans seed, but onely the mans seed vncléane. For we do not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that hee is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because he is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and vncorrupted, such as shoulde haue bene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained stedfastly determined wth vs, that so oft as the Scripture putteth vs in minde of the cleannesse of Christ, it is ment of his true nature of manhood: because it were superfluous to say that God is cleane. Also the sanctification that hee speaketh of in the seuenteenth of Iohn, could haue no place in the nature of god. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man is not vncleane or vitious of it selfe, but accidental by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocencie was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this vpon vs for an absurditie, that if the Worde of God did put on flesh, then was it inclosed in a narrow prison of an earthly body: this is but meere waiwardnesse: because although the infinite essence of the worde did growe together into one person with the nature of man: yet do we faine no inclosing of it. For the sonne of God descended maruellously from heauen, so as yet he left not heauen, it was his will to be maruellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conuersant in earth, and hang vpon the crosse, yet that he alway filled the worlde euen as at the beginning.

It is no dishonour vnto Christ to haue taken his originall of man.

The xiiij. Chapter.

How the two natures of the Mediator doe make one person.

The diuine & humane natures of Christ united in his person, yet in their properties distinguished, as the body and the soule in one and the same man.

NOW where it is saide, that the Worde was made flesh: that is not so to be vnderstanded, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusely mingled with flesh, but because he chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by vnite of person. For we so affirme the Godhead ioyned and vnited to the manhood, that either of them haue their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fit, whom we see to consist of two substances, wherof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the bodie, nor the bodie the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be feuerally spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewise of the bodie that thing may be said, which can by no meane agree with the soule: and that may be saide of the whole man, which can be but vnjustly taken neither of the soule nor of the bodie feuerally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the bodie sometime to the soule: and yet he that consisteth of them is but one man and not many. But such formes of speech doe signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diuers natures which doe make the same person. And so doe the Scriptures speake of Christ: sometime they giue vnto him those things that ought singularly to be referred to his manhood, and sometime those things that doe peculiarly belong to his Godhead, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them feuerally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiounesse eprisse, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the olde authors called Communicating of properties.

Things in scripture sometimes spoken of his person of Christ & agreeing

2 These things were but weake, vnlesse many phrases of Scripture, and such as be eachwhere ready to finde, did prooue that nothing heereof hath been deuised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was farre disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what caullillation the erromous spirits do deprave this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already foreknowen the Redeemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the mindes of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, and of purpose pronounceth vnto himselfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth about Abraham, hee doth vndoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that he worketh together with the father these things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these and such like are peculiarie ascribed to the Godhead. But whereas he is called the seruant of the Father: and whereas it is saide, that he grew in age, wisdom and fauour with God and men: that he seeketh not his owne glorie: that he knoweth not the last day: that he speaketh not of himselfe: that he doth not his owne will: where it is saide, that he was seene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in respect that he is God, neither can he encrease in any thing, and he worketh all things for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choice of his owne will, and can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not generallie ascribe these things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them vpon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul saith, that God did by his owne blood purchase vnto him a Church: and the Lord of glorie crucified. Again, where Iohn saith, that the Word of life was felt Truly God neither hath blood, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But because he which was both very God and man, Christ being crucified, did shed his blood for vs: those things that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, and yet not without reason giuen to his Godhead. A like example is, where Iohn teacheth that God gaue his soule for vs: therefore there also the property of the manhood is communicate with the other nature. Again, when Christ said being yet conuerfant in earth, that no man haue ascended into heauen, but the sonne of man that was in heauen: truly according to his manhood, and in the flesh that he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himselfe was both God & man, by reason of the vnitie of both natures, he gaue to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all do these places set forth the true substance of Christ, which do comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in the Gospell of him. For that which is there read is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhood, but both together, that he hath receiued of his father power to forgive sinnes, to raise vp whom he will, to giue right iustices, holinesse and saluation, to be made iudge ouer the quicke and the dead, to be honoured euen as the father is: Finally, that he is called the light of the worlde, the good shepheard, the onely dore, the true Vine. For such prerogatiues had the sonne of God, when he was shewed in the flesh, which although he enioyed with his father before the world was made, yet hee had them not in the same maner or the same respect, and which could not be giue to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the iudgement ended, that yeld vp the kingdom to God & the Father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall haue any ending: but euen as he lay hid vnder the baseness of the flesh, & abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and laying aside the power of maiesty, he shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and hauing performed all such subiection, at length is crowned with honor and glory, & advanced to the highest dominion, that all knees shall bow before him: so shall he then yelde in respect of the one nature onely, sometimes of one nature and agreeing in respect of the other.

vp to his father both that name and crowne of glorie, and whatsoeuer he hath receiued of his father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpose is power and dominion giuen him, but that the father should gouerne vs by his hande? In which sense it is also saide, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, till we may enjoy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they tooke no heede to the person of the Mediator, haue obscured the naturall meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the Gospel of Iohn, and haue entangled themselves in many snares. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right vnderstanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shall reigne till he come forth to iudge the world, in so much as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the small measure of our weaknesse. But when we being made partakers of the heauenly glorie, shall see God such as he is, then he hauing performed the office of Mediator, shall cease to be the embassadour of his father, and shall be contented with that glorie which he enioyed before the making of the world: and the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the meane degree betweene God and vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whome are all things, and one Lord, by whom are all things, euen he to whome the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntill his diuine maiestie be to be seene face to face. From whom so farre is it off that any thing shall decay, by yeelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shall become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also cease to be the head of Christs because Christ godhead shall then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certaine veile.

4 And this obseruation shall doe no small seruice to assoile many doubtse, if the readers doe fitly apply it. For it is maruelous how much the vnskillfull, yea some not vterly vnlearned, are cumbered with such formes of speech, which they see spoken by Christ, which doe well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood, because they consider not that they doe agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediator. And it is alway easie to see, how wel all things hang together, if they haue a sober expositor, to examine so great mysterie with such deuout reuerence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and frantike spirits trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are to ioynly spoken of both natures, that they generally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, vnited, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true sonne of God, euen according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driuen far away from vs, which when he went about rather to drawe in sunder, then to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas wee see that the Scripture crieth out with loude voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin her selfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while we go about to shew the vnitie of person, we destroy either nature. For we haue already alleaged so many testimonies, and there are euery where so many other to be alleaged, where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood: as may stop the moutches euen of the most contentious. And a little hereafter I will adioine some testimonies to confute better that fained deuise, but at this present, one place shall content vs. Christ woulde not haue called called his body a Temple, vntlesse the godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synode at Ephesus, to alio was Eutiches afterward condemned in the Synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lesse pestilent a monster, Michael Serretus, which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vncreat. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his furtletie, that the distinction of the two natures being once ouerthrowne, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole proceffe he trauaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were only certaine shadowish figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truly to be the sonne of God. And we in deede do confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable fauour of God, vnlesse this dignitie were giuen him to be, and be called the only begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is counted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worlds, did by hypostaticall vnion take vpon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall vnion is called with the old fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was deuised to ouerthrowe the dotting error of Nestorius, because he fained that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Serretus slandereth vs, that we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Word was alreadye the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurditie it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to Maria do secretly shew, That holy thing that shall be borne of thee, shall be called the sonne of God: as if he should haue sayd, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the lawe, should now become famous and euery where knowne abroad. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the childre of God, freely and with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the old time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, and bearing them bold vpon that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heauenly fatherhood is become more plainly knowne: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a priuilege to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, that God neuer was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the onely begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their own wickednesse maketh hatfull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Serretus should cauil, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined with himselfe, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beasts: but because they could not in deede be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose of great dignitie did not hang vpon the redemption to come; yet must it needes be, that the sonne in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I will repeate it againe shortly, and adde the same of mankind. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God shoulde be cōmon father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head and the first begotten of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: I thinke I do rightly gather that he was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

Col. 1. 15.

Christ truly and properly the sonne of Gods in the flesh, but not in respect of the flesh which before heooke upon him, he was the sonne.

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruetus and other such frantike men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Now let them answer me whether he be the sonne according to both natures, and in respect of both. So indeede they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. We graunt in deede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption onely and grace, but the true and naturall, and therefore onely sonne, that by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchsafeth to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and onely begotten sonne, he giueth to Christ onely. How can he be the onely sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which we haue receiued by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truly and properly the sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, and offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father vpon the crosse: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he saith, he was seuered out to preach the Gospell of God, which he had before promised of his sonne, which was begotten of the seede of Dauid according to his flesh, and declared the sonne of God in power. But: why, when he nameth him distinctly the sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he seuerally say, that he was declared the sonne of God, vnlesse he meant to shew that this did hang vpon some other thing, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he saith, that he suffered by the weaknesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirit, euen so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs graunt, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his father for which he is called the sonne of God: and the same is another thing and seuerall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here and there sometimes the sonne of God, and sometimes the sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention mooued: but according to the common vse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the sonne of God in respect of the Godhead and eternall essence: because it is no lesse meere that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the sonne of man. Againe, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Lewes, is God blessed for euer. Now if in both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the sonne of man, is not also the sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

7 They doe in deede disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, that God spared not his own sonne, and where the Angel commaunded, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the sonne of the highest. But, least they should glorie in so fickle an obiection, let them wey with vs a little, how strongly they reason For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the sonne of God, because he that is conceived is called the sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because Iohn saith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his hands haue handled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet: Thou Bethleem in the land of Iuda, art a little one in thousands of Iuda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israell, and his coming forth from the beginning, from the dayes of eternitie. How will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to follow such manner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we do not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conioyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doeth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to beholde the maruclous and singular fauour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserue. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency euen according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnitie of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures vnited into one person, be diuers wayes called the Sonne of God, than that he be according to diuers respects, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the sonne of Man. And no more doeth that other cauillation of Seruetus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is nowhere called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the describing of him, then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already cleerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the word begotten of the eternall father, and that this name doth no other wise belong to the person of the Mediator which he hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not bene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutual relation to the Sonne, by whome all kinred or fatherhood is reckoned in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euen in the time of the law and the Prophets, he was the Sonne of God, before that this name was commonly known in the Church. But if they strue onely about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incōprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (saith he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this testimonie wil not be of sufficient force: neither do I much ground vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they do maliciously caull, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent haue openly testified the same: so that their shamelesse is no lesse worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred which dare obiekt Irenæus and Tertullian against vs, both which do confesse that the Sonne of God was inuisible, which afterward appeared visible.

8 But although Seruetus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuses, which peraduenture the other would not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that do not acknowledge Christ to be the sonne of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichæes in olde time did foolishly assume, that man hath his soule (as it were) by deriuation from God, because they read that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast holde of the name of Sonne, that they leaue no difference betweene the natures, but babble disorderly that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisedome that Salomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhoode. It were indeede profitable to confute the grosser deteites of Seructus, wherewith hee hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the ende that the godly readers admonished by this example, may holde themselues within the compasse of sobernesse and modestie: sauing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I haue already done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them cometh to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and euen then he was before appointed to be man that shoulde be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other worde of God but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time he foundeth the Spirit with the Worde, for that God distributed the inuisible Word and the Spirite into flesh and soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, that he which then was but a shadow in forme, was at length begotten by the word, to which he assigneth the office of feed. Whereby it shal follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seede of the word of God. For although he compound Christ of three vncreate elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faineth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall Godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And least he should seeme to strip Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantiall with God, and that the Worde was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while hee cannot conceiue Christ to be the Sonne of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Word to nothing, and taketh from vs the sonne of Dauid, that was promised to be the Redeemer. He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predestination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with god in the three elements, which afterwarde appeared in the first light of the worlde, in the cloude and in the pillar of fire. Now how shamefully he sometime disagreeeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that haue their sound wit may gather, that with the circumstances of this vnclane dog the hope of saluation is vterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the godhead it selfe, it should cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our Redeemer, but he that begotten of the seede of Abraham and Dauid, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And he wrongfully standeth vpon the words of Iohn, that the Worde was made flesh. For as they resist the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked inuention, wherof Eutiches was author, for as much as the onely purpose of the Euangelist was to defend the vnitie of persons in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That we may knowe, to what end Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his Prophetical office, his kingdome, and his Priesthood.

Christ a Prophet, a King, and Priest, so to be acknowledged, not with a cold mentioning of those titles, but with a right vnderstanding of the end and use of them. The people

A Vergil saith rightly, that although the Heretikes doe bragge of the name of Christ, yet they haue not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deed. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the worlde, founde in their mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretence of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul may be well spoken of them, that they haue not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde founde matter of saluation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be established, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes. For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, and a Priest. Albeit, it were but small profite to knowe those names, without knowledge of the ende and vse of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profite, where it is not knowne what each of these titles containeth in it. Wee haue saide before, how though God sending Prophets by continual course one after another, did neuer leaue his people destitute of profitable doctrine, & such as was sufficient to saluation: that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this perswasion, that full light of vnderstanding was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritans, who yet neuer knewe the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias cometh he shall teach vs all things. And the Iewes had not rashly gathered this vpon presumptions in their minds: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleued. Notable among the other is that saying of Esai: Beholde, I haue made him a witness to peoples: I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaster to peoples: euen as in another place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counsell. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the Gospell, after that he had said, that God in the olde time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diuersly, and vnder manifold figures, addeeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloued sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to keepe the Church in suspence, and to vphold it vntill the comming of the Mediator, therefore we reade that in their scattering abroad, the faithfull complained that they were deprived of that ordinarie benefite, saying: We see not our tokens: there is not a prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to scale vp the vision and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecie, which is there spoken of, should be stablished in assured credit, but also that the faithfull should learne with contented minde to waite the Prophets for a time, because the fulnesse and closing vp of all reuelations was at hand.

2 Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we knowe that in the time of the lawe, as well the Prophets as Priests and kings were anointed with holy oyle. For which cause the renowned name of Messias was giuen to the promised Mediator. But though in deede I confesse (as I haue also declared in another place,) that he was called Messias, by peculiar consideration and respect of his kingdome: yet the anointings in respect of the office of Prophet and of Priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Esai, in these words. The spirit of the Lord Iehua vpon me. Therefore the Lord hath anointed me, that I should preach to the mecke, should bring health to the contrite in hart, should declare deliuerance to captiues, should publish the yeere of good will, &c. We see that he was anointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witness of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is seuered from other teachers that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that hee tooke not the anointing for himselfe alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole bodie, that in his continuall preaching of the Gospell, the vertue of the Spirit should ioyne with all. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, that by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an ende is made of all prophecies, so that they doe diminish his authority, that being not content with the Gospell, doe patch any forraine thing vnto it. For that voice which thundered from heauen, saying: This is my beloued sonne, heare him: hath aduanced him by singular priuiledge aboue the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is powrd abroad from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Joel. Your children shall prophesie, and your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was giuen vs vnto wisdom, and in another place, that in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge and vnderstanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceiue what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitenes of heavenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place, I haue counted it precious to know nothing, but Iesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospel. And herunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might know that in the sum of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisdome.

3 Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spirituall. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serueth, and what it auaileth vs, and the whole force and eternitie thereof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angell doth attribute to the person of Christ, and againe the Angell in Luke doth worthily apply to the saluation of the people. But that is also double or of two sorts, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the church, the other is proper to euery member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalme: I haue once sworne by my holines to Dauid, I will not lie, his seede shall abide for euer, his seare shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be established as the Moone for euer, and a faithfull witness in heauen. Neither is it doubtfull, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his sonne an eternall gouerner and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophesie can he found no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediately after the death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignitie of the kingdome fell away, and was to the dishonour of the house of Dauid conueied ouer to a priuate man, and after ward by little and little was diminished, till at length it came to vtter decay, with heaue and shamefull destruction. And the same meaning hath that exclamation of Esaie: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he so pronounceth that Christ shall remaine aliuie after death, that he ioyneth him with his members. Therefore fo oft as we heare that Christ is armed with eternal power, let vs remember that the euerlasting continuance of the Church is vpholden by this support, to remaine still safe among the troublesome tossings, where with it is continually vexed, and among the grieuous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when Dauid scorneth the boldnesse of his enemies, that goe about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kings and peoples ragged in vaine, because he that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assaults: he assureth the godly of the continuall preservation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope well so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when he saith, in the person of God: sit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstoole: he warneth vs, that howe manie and strong enemies fouer doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to preuaile against that vnchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Decill with all the preparation of the worlde, may be able at any time to destroy the Church, which is grounded vpon the eternall seate of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the speciall vse of euerie one, the very same eternall continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we see, that whatsoeuer is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is verie fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spirituall, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is now defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full fruit of this grace in the world to come.

4 That, as we haue saide, the force and profite of the kingdome of Christ cannot otherwise be perceiued by vs, but when we know it to be spirituall, appeereth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while wee must liue in warfare vnder the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is hard and miserable: what then should it profite vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenly king, vnlesse we were certaine to enioy the fruite thereof out of the state of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be knowen, that whatsoever felicitie is promised vs in Christ, it consisteth not in outward commodities, that we should lead a merrie and quiet life, flourish in wealth, be assured from all harmes, and flow full of those delightful things that the flesh is wont to desire: but that it wholly belongeth to the heauenly life. But as in the worlde the prosperous and desired state of the people is partly maintained by plentie of good things and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences, whereby it may be safe against outward violence: so Christ also doth enrich his with all things necessarie to eternall saluation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength, by which they may stande inuincible against all assaults of principall enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs then for himselfe, and that both within and without: that being furnished so farre as God knoweth to be expedient for vs, with the gifts of the spirite, whereof we are naturally emprie, we may by these first fruits perceiue that we are truly ioyned to god vnto perfect blessednesse. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the same spirit, we may not doubt that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Diuell, the world, and euerie kinde of hurtfull thing. To this purpose tendeth the answere of Christ to the Pharisees, that because the kingdome of God is within vs, it shall not come with obseruation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same king, vnder whom the foueraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in some required him to shewe forth his signes. But he, because they (who otherwise are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest vpon worldly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their owne consciences, because the kingdome of God is righteousness, peace and ioy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdom of Christ auileth vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subiect to corruption, but spiritual: he listeth vs vp euen to eternall life, that we may patiently passe ouer this life in miseries, hunger, cold, contempt, reproches, and other greefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will neuer leaue vs destitute, but succour vs in our necessitis, till hauing ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his maner of reigning, to communicate with vs all that he hath receiued of his father. Now whereas he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnisheth vs with beauty and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministred vnto vs most plentifull matter to glorie vpon, and also bolde courage to fight without feare against the diuell, sinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteousness, we may valiantly ouercome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally listeth vs with his gifts, so we againe for our part, may bring forth fruite to his glorie.

5 Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vnto vs, not done with oyle or ointments made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God because vpon him hath rested the spirit of wisdom, vnderstanding, counsell, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalmie reporteth that he was anointed about his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needie and hungrie. For, as it is already said, he is not priuately enriched for himselfe, but to poure his plentie vpon vs, being hungry and dry. For as it is saide, that the father gaue the spirit to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all we should receiue of his fulnes, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall giuing, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is diuersly distributed to the faithfull, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I said sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdome of Christ consisteth in the spirite, not in earthly delightes or pomps, and therefore we must forsake the world that we may be partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptisme of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested vpon him in the likenesse of a doue. That the holy Ghost and his giftes are meant by the word Anointing, ought to seeme neither noueltie nor absurditie. For we are none other way quickened, specially for so much as concerneth the heauenly life: there is no drop of liuely foec in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his seate in Christ, that from thence the heauenly riches might largely flow out vnto vs, whereof we are so needy. And whereas both the faithfull stand inuincible by the strength of their King, and also his spirituall riches plenteously flow out vnto them, they are not vnworthyly called Christians. But this eternitie whereof we haue spoken, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then he shall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and the Father. Againe: the Sonne himselfe shall be made subiect, that God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing else, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingdome shall not be such as it is now. For the Father hath giuen all power to the Sonne, that by the Sonnes hand he may gouerne, cherish and sustaine vs, defende vs vnder his safegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a little time we are wauering abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and vs, by little and little to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truly, whereas he sitteth on the right hand of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the Fathers deputie, vnder whome is the whole power of his dominion, because it is Gods will to rule and defend his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expounde it in the first chapter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hand of the Father, to be the head of the Church, which is his bodie. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is giuen him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Iesus all knees should bow, and all tongues confesse that it is to the glory of God the Father. For euen in the same words also hee setteth out in the kingdome of Christ an order necessarie for our present weakenesse. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God shall then be by himselfe the onely heade of the Church, because Christes office in defending of the Church, shall be fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, because his Father did set him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lordlie power by him. For though there be many Lordships in the world, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whome are all things and we in him, and one Lorde Christ, by whom are all things and we by him sayeth Paul. Whereupon is rightlie gathered that he is the selfe same God, which by the mouth of Isaie affirmed himselfe to be the King and the Law maker of the Church. For though he doe euery where call all the power that hee hath, the benefite and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediator, that descending from the bosome and incomprehensible glory of the Father, he might approach ne vnto vs. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with al consent prepared to obey, and that with great cheerefulnes we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he ioyneth the offices of King and Pastor to ward them that willingly yeelde themselves obedient: so on the other side, we heare that he beareth an yron scepter, to breake and bruse all the obstinate like potters vessels: we heare also that he shall be the iudge of nations, to couer the earth with dead corpses, and to ouerthrow the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples scene at this day: but the full prooffe thereof shall be at the last iudgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome.

To know the eternall kingdome of Christ is cannot profite vs at all except we know it to be spirituall, and to consist of two parts, the enriching of his subiects with good things, and the forcible defending of them against the assaults of principall enemies: out of this our comfort floweth.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the ende and vse of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spot, that should by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entrie; and God according to his office of Iudge is bent against vs, it is necessary that some expiation be vsed, that he being a Priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behooued that he should come forth with a sacrifice. For in the Law it was not lawfull for the Priest to enter into the Sanctuary without blood, that the faithfull might know, that though there were a Priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sins were purged. Vpon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the Epistle to the Hebrues, from the seuenth Chapter almost to the end of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of Priesthood can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our guiltinesse, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemne oath of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a Priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall point, which he knew to be the chiefe ioynt whereupon our salvation hanged. For as it is saide, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the Priestes doe sanctifie vs and obtaine grace for vs, from which the vncleannesse of our wicked doings and sinnes doth debarre vs. So doe we see, that we must begin at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profite of his Priesthoode may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that he is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godly consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tenderesse of God, and are certainly perswaded that it pleaseth him whatsoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the Law, God commanded sacrifices of beastes to be offered to him: there was an other and a new order in Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the Priest: because there neither could be found any other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthy so great honor to offer vp to God his onely begotten Sonne. Now Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father fauourable and mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the fellowship of so great an honor. For we that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priestes in him doe offer vpon our selues, and all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heavenly sanctuary, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, may be acceptable and sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre doth that saying of Christ extend: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, hauing his holinesse powred vpon vs, in as much as he hath offered vs with himselfe to his Father, we that otherwise doe stinke before him, doe please him as pure and cleane, yea, and holy. Hercunto serueth the anointing of the sanctuary, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the comparison of contrarietic is to be noted betweene this anointing, and that shadowed with anointing that then was in vse: as if the Angell should haue said, that the shadowes being driuen away, there should be a cleare Priesthood in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their inuention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, haue presumed to thrust in themselves to kill him: which is daylie enterprised among the Papiests, where the Masse is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

AL that we haue hitherto said of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, we may seeke for righteousness, deliuerance, life and saluation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen giuen to men wherein they must be saued. Neither was the name of Iesus giue him vnadvisedly, or at chauceable aduenture, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angell the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to saue the people from their sinnes. In which words that is to be noted, which we haue touched in another place, that the office of redeemer was appointed him, that he should be our Saviour: but in the meane time our redemption should be but vnperfect, vlesse he should by continuall proceedings conuey vs forward to the vttermost make of saluation. Therefore, so soone as we swaue neuer so little from him, our saluation by little and little vaniseth away, which wholly resteth in him: so that all they wilfully spoile themselues of all grace, that rest not in him. And the admonition of Bernard is worthy to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not only light, but also meat, yea & oile also, without which all the meate of the soule is drie, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning wherof all that is set before vs is vnfauorite. Finally, that it is hony in the mouth, melodie in the care, and ioyfulness in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoeuer is spoken in disputation is vnfauorite, but where this name soundeth. But here it behoueth to weigh diligently how saluation is purchased by him for vs: that we may not onely be perswaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast vpholding of our faith, we may refuse all such things as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For sith no man can descend into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demandeth satisfaction: there is no common assurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alway vpon sinners, till they be loofe from their guiltinesse: who, as he is a righteous iudge, suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

How God can be saide to haue been our enemye till Christ reconciled vs, & yet giue vs his name, by whom we might be reconciled, seeing this worke is reconcilie vs sheweth loue before reconciliation.
 Rom 5. 10.
 Gal. 2. 10.
 Col. 1. 11.

2. But before we goe anie further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which preuented vs with his mercie, was our enemye vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For how could he haue giuen vs in his onely begotten sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse he had alreadie before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vndoe this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enemye to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accused till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were seuered from God, till they were receiued into a conioyning by his bodie. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that we may the better vnderstand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse words, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and euerlasting death did rest vpon vs, we would lesse acknowledge how miserable we should be without Gods mercie, and would lesse regard the benefite of deliuerance. As for example. If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserved, thou shouldst haue suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath wilfully and of his owne free kindnesse kept thee in fauour, and not suffered thee to be estranged from him, hee hath so deliuered thee from that perill: truly hee will be moued with, and in some part feele how much he oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that hee was by liane estranged from God, the heire of wrath, subiect to the curse of eternall death, excluded from all hope of saluation, a stranger from all blessing of God, the bondslawe of Sathan, captiue vnder the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordained vnto and already entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreat for him, that Christ tooke vpon him and suffered the punishment which by the iust iudgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that he hath purged with his blood those euils that made them hatefull to God, that by his expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the Father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betweene God and men: that vpon this bond is contained his good will toward them: shall not he be so much the more moued with these, as it is more luely represented out of how great misery he hath bene deliuered? In a summe: because our minde can neither desirously enough take holde of life in the mercie of God, nor receiue it with such thankfulness as we ought, but when it is before stricken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath God and dread of eternal death, we are taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ we may see God in manner wrathfully bent against vs, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that we may embrace his good will and fatherly kindnes no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weaknesse of our capacitie, yet it is not falsely said. For God which is the highest righteousness, cannot loue wickednesse which he seeth in vs all. Therefore wee all haue in vs that, which is worthy of the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truly we are all in displeasure of God, guiltie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not looke that which is his in vs, he findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue. For howsoeuer we be sinners by our owne fault, yet we remaine his creatures. Howsoeuer we haue purchased death to our selues, yet he made vs vnto life. So is he moued by meeke and free louing of vs to receiue vs into fauour. But sith there is a perpetuall and vnappeasable disagreement betweene righteousness and iniquitie, so long as we remaine sinners, he cannot receiue vs wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholly reconcile vs vnto him, he doth by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoever euill is in vs, that we, which before were vncleane and vnpure, may now appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doth with his loue preuent and goe before our reconciliation in Christ, yea, because he first loued vs, therefore he afterward doth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But because vntill Christ with his death come to succour vs, there remaineth wickednesse in vs, which deserueth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore we are not fully and firmly ioyned to God, vntill Christ doe ioine vs. Therefore if we will assure our selues to haue God made well pleased and fauourable vnto vs, we must fasten our eyes and mindes vpon Christ onely: as indeede we obtaine by him onely, that our finnes be not imputed to vs, the imputing where of, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paul saith, that the same loue, wherewith God embraced vs before the creation of the world, was stayed and grounded vpon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the Scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accord very well together, where it is said: that God declared his loue toward vs in this, that hee gaue his onely begotten Sonne to death: and yet that he was our enemy till he was made fauorable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly prooued to them that require the Testament of the olde Church I will alleadge one place of Augustine, where he teacheth the very same that we doe. The loue of God (saith hee) is incomprehensible and vnchangeable. For hee beganne not to loue vs, since the time that we were reconciled to him by the blood of his Sonne. But before the making of the worlde hee loued vs, euen before that we were any thing at all, that wee might also be his children with his onely begotten soone. Therefore whereas we are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the son did therefore reconcile vs vnto him, that he might now beginne to loue vs whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that alreadie loued vs, to whom we were enimies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I saye, let the Apostle beare witness. He doth commend (saith he) his loue toward vs, because when we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. He therefore had a loue to vs, euen then when we were enimies to him and wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a maruellous and diuine manner he loued vs, euen then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednes had on euerie side wasted away his worke, he knewe how in euerie one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to loue that which he had made. These be the words of Augustine.

5 Now where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our finnes, and taken away the strife betweene vs and God, and purchased such righteousnesse as might make him fauourable and well willing toward vs: it may be generally answered, that he hath brought it to passe by the whole course of his obedience. Which is prooued by the testimonie of Paul. As by one mans offence many were made sinners, so by one mans obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth the cause of the pardon that deliuereth vs from the curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ, saying: When the fulnes of time was come, God sent his son made of a woman, subject to the law, to redeeme them that were vnder the law: And so affirmed that in his very baptisme was fulfilled one part of righteousnesse, that he obediently did the commandment of his father. Finally, from the time that he tooke vpon him the person of a seruant, he began to pay the ranfome to redeeme vs. But the scripture to set out the manner of our saluation more certainly, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. He himselfe pronounced that he gaue his life to be a redemption for many. Paul teacheth that he died for our sins. John Baptist cried out that Christ came to take away the sins of the world, because he was the Lamb of God. In another place Paul saith, that we are iustified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his own blood. Againe, that we are iustified in his blood & reconciled by his death. Againe, he that knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that we might be the righteousnes of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be infinit, and many of them must be hereafter alleaged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beleefe, which they call the Apostles creed, it is verie orderly passed immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehendeth it wholly from the beginning to the end in saying, that he abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient to his father to death, euen the death of the crosse. And tuely euen in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, valesse it had bene willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousnesse. Therefore, where the Lord testified, that he gaue his soule for his sheepe, he expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. According to the which meaning, Esau saith, that he held his peace like a lambe before the shearer. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went forth and met the souldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeelde himselfe to iudgement to be pronounced vpon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities vpon him, and it behooued that his obedience to his father, should be this way tried. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable loue toward vs, to wraastle with horrible feare, and in the midst of these cruell torments to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might prouide for vs. And this is to be beleued, that there could could no sacrifice be well offered to God any other wise, but by this that Christ forsaking all his own affection, did submit & wholly yeeld himselfe to his fathers wil. For prooffe whereof, the apostle doth fitly allage that testimonie of the Psalm: in the book of the lawe it is written of me, that I may do thy will, O God, I will, & thy law is in the midst of my hart. Then I said: Loe, I come. But because trembling consciences finde no rest but in a sacrifice and washing whereby sinnes are cleansed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due vnto vs, before the heavenly iudgement seate of God, therefore first of all is recited how he was condemned before Ponce Pilate president of Iurie: that we should know that the punishment whereinto we were subiect, was iustly laide vpon vs. We could not escape the dreadfull iudgement of God: Christ, to deliuer vs from it, suffred himselfe to be condemned before a mortall man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the president is expressed not onely to procure credite to the historie, but that we should learne that which Esay teacheth, that that chastisement of our peace was vpon him, and that by his stripes we are healed. For to take away our damnation, euery kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to be chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltinesse vpon himselfe, he might deliuer vs from them both. If he had beene murdered by theeeues, or had beene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the common people: in such a death there should haue beene no apparance of satisfaction. But when hee was brought to be arraigned before the iudgement seate, when hee was accused and pressed with witnesse against him, and was by the mouth of the iudge condemned to die: by these tokens we vnderstande, that he did beare the person of a guiltie man and of an euill doer. And heere are two things to be noted, which both were aforespoken by the prophecies of the Prophets, and do bring a singular comfort and confirmation of Faith. For when we heare that Christ was sent from the iudges seate to death, and was hanged among theeeues, we haue the fulfilling of that prophetic, which is alleaged by the Euangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? euen to take vpon him the steede of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because he suffred death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we heare that he was acquitted by the same mouth whereby he was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more then once to beare witness of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other prophet: that hee repayed that which he had not taken away. And so we shall beholde the person of a sinner and euill doer represented in Christ: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. He suffred therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the soleme sentence of the President, was reckoned in the number of wicked doers: but yet not so, but that he was by the same iudge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittall, that the guiltinesse which made vs subiect to punishment, is remooued vpon the head of the Sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, we ought principally to holde fast, least we tremble and be carefull all our life long, as though the iust vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the soane of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

6 Beside that, the verie manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accused, not onely, by opinion of men, but also by decree of the law of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Crosse, he made himselfe subiect to the curse. And so it behooued to be done, that when the curse was remooued from vs to him, we might be deliuered from all curse that for our sinnes was prepared the crosse in the death of Chr. 3

Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of

prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadow expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offered for finnes, were called Ashemoth. Which worde properly signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figuratiue change of name, the holy Ghost ment to shewe, that they were like vnto cleansing plaisters to draw out to themselves, and beare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratiuely represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is indeed deliuered in Christ the originall patterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gaue his owne soule to be an alham, that is a satisfactorie oblation, as the prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so cease to be imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainly, where he teacheth, that hee which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that wee might bee made the righteoufnesse of God in him. For the sonne of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put vpon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side couered vs with his cleanness. It seemeth that he meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remooued, and laide vpon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered vp to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, wee might cease to dread the wrath of God. Nowe is it plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs all were laide vpon him, that is, that he extending to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enter-changed imputation, couered with them. Of this, the crosse wherunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith hee) redeemed vs from the curse of the lawe, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: A curse is euerie one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where hee teacheth that Christ did beare our finnes vpon the tree. Because by the very token of the curse we doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laide vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstanded, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerladen, but rather that in taking it vpon him, hee did tread downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so saith conceiuech ac quitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doth not without a cause honourable report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he saith, that the hand writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the princely powers were spoiled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternall spirit. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be thoroughly setled in our hearts, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For we could not certainly beleue that Christ was the ransome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse hee had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therefore there is so often mention made of blood, where the Scripture sheweth the manner of our redeeming. Albeit the blood of Christ, that was shed, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to cleanse away our filthinesse.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where againe it is to be seen, how he did euery where put himselfe in our steed, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held vs bound vnder his yoke. Christ in our steed did yeld himself into the power of death, to deliuer vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we shoulde not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs.

But in this he differed from vs, that he gaue himselfe to death, as it were to be deuoured, not that he should be swallowed vp with the gulfes of it, but rather that he should swallow vp it, of which we should haue beene presently swallowed: that he gaue himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he should ouerthrowe death which approached neere vs, yea, and had alreadie beaten vs downe and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuell, and might deliuer them that by feare of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of himselfe with vs, he mortifieth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter vse their owne workes: and killeth our old man, that it should no more lue and beare fruite. And to the same purpose pertaineth his buriall, that wee being partakers thereof, should also be buried in sinne. For when the Apostle teacheth that wee are graffed into the likenesse of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his crosse the worlde was crucified to vs, and we to the worlde, that we are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhort vs to expresse the example of Christes death, but he declareth that there is such effectualnesse in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, vnlesse they will make his death vnprofitable and fruitelesse. Therefore in the death and buriall of Christ, there is offered vs a double benefit to be enjoyed, that is deliuerance from death, whereunto we were become bond, and the mortifying of our flesh.

Col. 3. 3.

3 But it is not meete to ouerpasse his going downe to the helles, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeereth by the writings of the old fathers, that that part which is read in the Creede was not in olde time so much vsed in the Churches: yet in encreating of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a verie profitable and not to be despised mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that doe not leaue it out. Whereby we may gesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by litle and litle growe in vse in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common iudgement of all the godlie: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe to the helles, although after diuers manner of exposition. But by whome, or at what time it was first added, maketh litle to the purpose. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heede vnto, that we therein certainly haue a full and in all pointes perfect summe of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thrust, but that which is taken out of the most pure word of God. Now, if any wil not for precise curiositie admit it into the Creede, yet shall it it aight way be made to appeere plainly, that it is of so great importance to the summe of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is lost a great part of the fruite of the death of Christ. There are againe somethat thinke, that there is no newe thing spoken in this article, but that in other wordes the same thing is repeated which was spoken before of his buriall: for as much as the word Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture often times vsed for the graue. I graunt that to bee true, which they alleage of the signification of the word, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue. but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily persuaded to dissent from them. For what an idlenes were it, when a thing not hard to vnderstande, hath once beene set out in plaine and easie wordes, afterward with darker implication of wordes, rather to point towarde it than to declare it. For when two manners of speaking that expresse one thing be ioyned together, it behooueth that the later be an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should say thus: Whereas it is saide that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell? Againe, it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition

Christes descending into hell a necessarie article of our faith, whereby to vnderstande his lying in the graue were an idle fancy.

Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of

could haue crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe pointes of our faith are summarily noted in as few words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall haue somewhat diligently weyed the matter it selfe will easily agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the lawe, to carrie them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliuer them out of prison wherein they were kept inclosed: and to the prooffe hereof they doe wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalmes, that he brake the brasen gates and yron barres. Againe, out of Zacharie, that he redeemed them that were bound, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalmes speaketh of their deliuerances that in farre countries are cast captiue into bonds, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonical ouerthrow, wherein the people was oppressed, to a drie pit or bottomlesse depth, and therewithall teacheth that the saluation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepe hels: I woe not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, though that there was a certaine place vnder the earth whereunto they haue fained the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day many doe earnestly defend it for a truth: is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to inclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what neede was it that Christes soule should go downe thither to set them at libertie? I do in deede willingly confesse, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely tasted of by hope, was then deliuered to the world. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he saith, that Christ came and preached to the spirits that were in a dungeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very proccesse of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth thereby amplifye the force of Christes death, for that it pearced euen to the dead, when the godly soules enioyed the present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeere to the reprobate that they were excluded from all saluation. But whereas Peter in his saying maketh no distinction betwene them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but onely he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

10 But concerning Christes going downe to the hels, beside the consideration of the Creede, we must seeke for a more certaine exposition, and we assuredly haue such a one out of the worde of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death had bene to no effect, if he had suffered onely a corporall death: but it behooued also that he should feele the rigour of Gods vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath and satisfie his iust judgement. For which cause also it behooued that he should as it were hand to hand wraastle with the armies of the hels and the horror of eternall death. We haue euen now alleaged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was laide vpon him: that he was stricken of his father for our sinnes, and bruised for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the steede of wicked doers, as suretie and pledge, yea, and as the verie guiltie person himselfe, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should haue bene laide vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden still of the sorrowes of death. Therefore it is no maruell if it be saide that he went downe to the hels, such he suffered that death where with God in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is pernerred, because it were an absurditie to set that after his buriall which went before it. For after the setting forth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that inuisible and incomprehensible judgement which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should knowe that not onely the body of Christ was giuen to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater and more excellent price payd in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible tormentes of a damned and forsaken man.

11 According to this meaning doth Peter say; that Christ rose againe hauing loosed the sorowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or ouercome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the sorowes of death, which proceede frō the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For how small a matter had it bin, carelesly and as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true prooffe of his infinite mercie, not to shun that death which he so fore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his owne Feare: some translate it Reuerence or pietie, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the verie maner of speaking proueth. Christ therefore praying with teares and mightie crie, is heard of his own feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place he had put our person vpon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomles depth than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euen as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Euen thither wee see that Christ was thrown downe, so farre that by enforcement of distresse he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opiniō of other, than as he felt in himselfe: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is euident, that this saying proceeded out of the verie anguish of the bottome of his heart. Yet do we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemy or angry with him. For how could he be angry with his beloued sonne, vpon whom his munde rested? Or how could Christ by his intercession appeale his fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himselfe? But this is our meaning: that he suffered the grieuousnes of Gods rigor, for that he being stricken and tormented with the hand of God, did seele all the tokens of God when he is angry and punisheth. Whereupon Hilane argueth thus, that by this going downe we haue obtained this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeth with our iudgement, as where he sayth: The crosse, death, and hels are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of God is in the hels, but man is caued vp to heauen. But why do I alludge the testimony of a priuate man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruite of his victorie, that they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage? It behooued therefore, that he should ouercome that feare, that naturally doeth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his feare was no common feare or conceiued vpon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the diuell, with the horror of death, with the paines of the hels, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed ouer them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some kyd men, although vlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I do a famous wrong to Christ, because it was against conueniencie of reason, that he should be feareful for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this caualation, with saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperation, which is contrarie to faith. First they do but maliciously moue controuersie of Christs feare and trembling, which the Euangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirit and passionate with heauines, and at his verie meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfeit, that is too soule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truly teacheth, boldly confesse the sorowfullnesse of Christ, vnlesse we be ashamed of his crosse. And truly, if his soule had not beene partaker of paine, he had beene onely a redeemer for bodies. But it behooded that he should wrastle, to raise vp them that lay thrown downe. And his heauenly glorie is so nothing impaired thereby, that euen herein gloriously shined his goodnes which is neuer sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weaknesse vpon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorowes, which the Apostle setteth before vs: that this Mediator did feele our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in miseries. They say: that that thing which is euil of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which ioyneth these two things together, that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weaknesse of Christ should make vs afraide, wherunto he was not by violence or necessitie compelled, but by mere loue of vs, and by mercie was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoever hee of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backbiters decciued, that they doe not perceiue in Christ an infirmitie cleane and free from all fault and spot, because hee kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience. For whereas there can be founde no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affections doe with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they doe wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his vncorrupted state, then there was a moderation hauing force in all his affections, to restraîne excessie. Whereby it might well be that he was like vnto vs in sorowe, dread, and fearefulnesse, and yet that by this marke he differed from vs. Being so confuted, they leape to another cauillation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse and wrath of God from which he knew himselfe to be safe. But let the godly readers wey how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more fearfull than the most part of the very rascall sort of men. Theeues and other euill doers doe obstinately haste to death, many doe with haue courage despise it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it: for the sonne of God to be astonished and in a maner stricken dead with feare of it? For euen that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemencie of griefe, very drops of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shewe to the eyes of other, but when in a secret corner whither he was gone out of companie, he groined vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needefull that he should haue Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted manner of comforting. How shamefull a tendernesse, as I saide, should this haue been, to be so far tormented for feare of common death, as to melt in bloudie sweate, and not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of Angels: What? doth not that praiser thrise repeated, (Father if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitterness of hart, shew that Christ had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby appeareth that those triflers against whom I nowe dispute, doe boldly babble vpon things that they know not, because they neuer earnestly considered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we bee redeemed from the iudgement of God. But this is our wisdome, well to vnderstand how deere our saluation did cost the lonne of God. Now if a man should aske me, if Christ went then downe to hell, when he praied to escape that death: I answere, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how precuous and terrible torments hee suffered, when hee knew himselfe to stande to bee arraigned for our cause before the iudgement seate of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the spirite did hide it selfe to giue place to the weaknesse of the flesh: yet must we know, that the temptation by feeling of sorrow and feare

Christ sorrowed, feared, cryed, feeling the verie torment: in which they do whose enemy God is, although God were not his enemy. If he had not done this, where were our comfort?

Their reasons fruitless in no way not brooke this interpretation of Christs descending into hels, as if it were a disgrace, and him to be made subject to passions.

Heb. 4. 15.

Feare was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the sermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the sorrowes of death, because when he felt himselfe as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swaue from the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that his notable calling vpon God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? For though he was aboute measure grieued, yet he ceaseth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confuted aswell the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monotheletes. Apollinaris fained that Christ had an eternall spirit in stead of a soule, so that he was only but halfe a man. As though he could cleanse our finnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is that affection or will of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we know was troubled for this purpose, to driue away feare, and bring peace and quietnes to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monotheletes, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrarie affection. For herein is a plaine shew of contrarietie. Father deliuer me from this houre. But euen herefore I came euen into this houre. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in vs, euen then when we most of all endeouour to subdue our felices.

13 Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that we haue hitherto were but vnperfect. For sith there appeareth in the crosse, death, and buriall of Christ nothing but weaknesse: faith must passe beyond all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although we haue in his death a full accomplishment of satisfaction, because by it both we are reconciled to God, and his iust judgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penaltie fully payde: yet we are feide to be regenerate into a liuing hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the verie resurrection: but how this is, is better expressed in the words of Paul. For he sayeth, that Christ dyed for our finnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue said, that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousnesse was renewed and restored. For how could he by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselfe had lyen still ouercome by death? How could he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himselfe had bene vanquished in fight? wherefore we do so part the matter of our saluation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death we say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousnesse was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meane of his resurrection, his death doeth shew foorth her force and effect vnto vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his verie resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vttered his heavenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and a steadfast stay of our faith. As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirit. And in the same meaning in another, where he entreateth of perfection, he sayth: that I may know him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death should wauer, but that the power of God which keepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shewe it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it is vsed figurally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth

But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtained the crowne of conquest, so that there should be both resurrection and life: therefore Paul doth for good cause affirme that faith is destroyed, and the Gospell is become vaine and deceitfull, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in an other place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrors of damnation, to amplifie the same, he saith further: Yea, the same He which died, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediator for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that vpon the partaking of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be vnderstanded, that by his resurrection we obtaine another commoditie which aunswereth that mortification. For (saith the Apostle) we are therefore giued into the likeness of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to prooue that we ought to mortifie our members vpon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things that are aboue, and not those that are vpon the earth. By which wordes we are not onely exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newenes of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate into righteousness. We obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest deliuered vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we know that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he disputeth more at large in the fiftene chapter of his Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is said, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the truth both of his death and of his resurrection: as if it had bene saide, that he did both die the same death that other men naturally do die, and received immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

14 To his resurrection is not vnfitly adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ began more fully to set forth his glorie and power by rising againe, for that he had now laid away that base and vnnoble estate of mortall life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascending vp into heauen onely, he truly began his kingdom. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfill all things. Where in seeming of repugnance he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had been panned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conuersant in earth. And therefore Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by saith, that the holy Ghost was not yet giuen to the faithfull, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lorde himselfe also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not go away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But he giueth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leaue them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine maner, in deed inuisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enioineth, & the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not only to make them liue blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then aduanced his kingdom, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in ouerthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he tooke away the presence of his bodie out of our sight: not to cease to be present with the faithfull that yet wandered in the earth, but with more present power to gouerne both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the end of the world, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his bodie was lifted vp aboue all heauens, so his power and effectually working was powred and spread abroad beyond all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christ (saith he) was to goe by death to the right hande of the father, from whence he is to come to iudge the quicke and the dead: and that likewise in bodily presence according to the founde doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely and plainly: According to an vn-speakable and inuisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you all the daies, euen to the end of the world. But according to the flesh which the word tooke vpon him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Jewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laide in the graue, that he was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alway haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuertant according to the presence of his bodie fourty daies with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen and is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hand of his father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of maiestie. Therefore according to the presence of his maiestie, we alway haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truly said to his disciples: but me ye shall not alway haue. For the church had him a few daies according to the presence of his flesh, but now he holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eies.

15 Wherefore, it by and by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hand of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and gouerne in their steele. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father will be exalted and reigne by his hand: was receiued to sit at his right hand: as if it had bin said, that he was inuicted in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred vpon the possession of the gouernment committed vnto him, and that he not only entred vpon it, but also continueth in it till he come down to iudgment. For so doth the Apostle expound it, when he saith thus: The father hath set him at his right hand, aboue all principalltie and power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not onely in this worlde, but in the world to come, &c. He hath put all things vnder his feete, and hath giuen him to be head of the Church aboue all things. Now you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heauenly and earthly may with admiration look vpon his maiestie, be gouerned with his hand, behold his countenance, and be subiect to his power. And the Apostles meane nothing else when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednes is onely meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Actes, Stephen testifieth that he saw him standing, because we speake not here of the gesture of his bodie, but of the maiestie of his dominion: so that to sit is nothing else, but to be chiefe iudge in the heauenly iudgement seat.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit: For it learneth, that the Lord by his ascending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kingdome, which before had bene stopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our flesh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apostle saith, that we do alreadie in him after, a certaine manner sit in heauen. For that we doe not with bare hope looke for heauen, but alreadie in our head we possesse it. Moreover faith perceiuet that he sitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a sanctuarie not made with handes, and there appeereth before the face of the father a continuall aduocate and intercessour for vs: he so turneth the fathers eies to his right outlines, that he turneth them a way from our sinnes: He so reconcilth his minde vnto vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs away and passage to his throne, filling it with grace and mercifulnes, which otherwise would haue bin full of horror to wretched sinners.

Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of

Thirdly, faith conceiveth his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, wealth, and glorying against the heles. For ascending into heaven he led captiuitie captiue, & spoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with heaps of spirituall riches. He sitteth therefore on high, that from thence pouring out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a spirituall life, sanctifie with his spirit, and garnish his Church with the diuers gifts of his grace, preserue it safe against all hurts by his protection, reframe with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crosse and of our saluation: finally, hold all power, both in heauen and in earth, til he haue overthrowen all his enemies which are also our enemies, and made perfect the building vp of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdome: this is the power that his father hath given him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to iudge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doth in deed here shew to them that be his, plaine prooues of his power present among them: but because vnder the basenes of flesh his kingdome doth in a maner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke vpon that visible presence, which he will openly shew at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come down from heauen, euen such as he was seene to go vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnspeakable maiestie of his kingdome, with bright glistering of immortalitie, with infinit power of godhead, with a guard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our redeemer at that day, when he shall seuer the lambs from the goats, the chosen from forsaken: and there shall be none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his iudgement. For from the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the found of the trumpet, wherewith all shall be called to his iudgement seat, both they that shall be found slue at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there be that in this place expound the wordes of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the old writers did sticke in doubt vpon the construction of this article. But as the foresaid meaning is plaine and easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creed which is euident that it was written according to the capacity of the common people. And herewith nothing disagreeeth that which the Apostlie affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at the last iudgement shall not die after a naturall manner and order: yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shall be like a death, is not vnproperly called death. It is indeed certaine, that not all shall sleepe, but all shall be changed. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can denie to be a death: and yet in the meane time it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shall be summoned to the iudgement: because the dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they that shall remaine and be liuing, shall with them be sodenly taken vp into the aire to meet the Lord. And truly it is likly that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemne protestation of Paul to Timothie.

18 Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is iudge, which hath already appointed vs parteners with him in iudging: so far is it off, that he will go vp into the iudgement seat to condemne vs. For how should the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? how should the head seatter abroad his own members? how should the patrone condemne his owne clients? For if the Apostlie dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come forth that can condemne vs: it is much true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessour, will not condemne them whome hee hath receiued into his charge and tuition. It is truly no small assuredness, that we shall be brought before no other iudgement seat, but of our owne redeemer, from whome our saluation is to be looked for:

moreouer that he which no way by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sitting in iudgement performe his promise. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the Sonne, in giving him all iudgement, that so he hath provided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the iudgement. Hitherto I haue followed the order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in few wordes containeth the chiefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a Table, wherein we do distinctly and severally see those things that are in Christ woorthie to be taken heede vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the authour of it. It is truly by great consent of the old writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common trauell written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they iudged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, deliuered by the hands of the Apostles, was woorthie to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whence soeuer it proceeded at the first, it hath cuen from the first beginning of the Church, and from the very time of the Apostles, bene vsed as a publike confession, and received by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not priuately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is euident that cuen from the farthest age it hath alway continued of sacred authoritie and credite among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to be cared for, we haue wholly out of controuersie, thiz: the whole historie of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing contained in it that is not sealed with sound testimonies of Scripture. Which being vnderstanded, it is to no purpose either curiously to doubt, or to strue with any man who were the author of it: vnlesse perhaps it be not enough for some man to be assured of the truth of the holic Ghost, but if he do also vnderstand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hande it was written.

19 But forasmuch as wee doe see, that the whole summe of our saluation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, wee must beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any part thereof bee it neuer so little. If wee seeke for saluation, we are taught by the verie name of Iesus, that it is in him, if wee seeke for any other giftes of the Spirit, they are to bee founde in his anointing, if wee seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if wee seeke for cleannesse, it is in his conception: if wee seeke for tender kindnesse, it sheweth it selfe in his birth, whereby hee was made in all things like vnto vs, that hee might learne to sorrowe with vs: if wee seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if wee seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if we seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse: if we seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if we seeke for cleansing, it is in his bloude: if we seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the helles: if we seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his buriall: if we seeke for newenesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if we seeke for immortalitie, it is in the same: if we seeke for the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen, it is in his entrance into heauen: if we seeke for defense, for assurednesse, for plentie and store of all good things, it is in his kingdome: if we seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the iudgement, it is in the power giuen to him to iudge. Finallie, sith the treasures of all sortes of good things are in him, let vs drawe thence and from no where else, euen till wee bee full withall. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diuers hopes, although they haue principall regarde to him, yet cuen in this they are out of the right waie, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust cannot creepe in, where the abundance of his good gifts hath once bene well knowne.

Iohn 3. 16.
Iohn 4.

THis question is also to be assailed for an addition. For there are some little men after a wrong manner, which although they confesse that we obtaine saluation by Christ, yet cannot abide to heare the name of deseruing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will haue Christ to be onely the instrument, or minister, not the Author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deede I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the iudgement of God, then there shall be no roome for deseruing: because there can not be found in man any worthinesse that may deserue the fauour of God. But, as Augustine most truly writeth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Sauiour himselfe, the man Christ Iesus, which hath obtained so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deseruings of workes or of faith going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserued to be taken vp by the Word that is coeternall with the father into one person, and so to be the only begotten Son of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom according to the measure of euery one, it floweth abroad into all his members. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made Christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ. Againe in another place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediator himselfe. For he that made of the seede of Dauid a man righteous that neuer should be vnrightheous, without any deseruing of his will going before, euen the same he doth of vnrightheous make them righteous that are the members of that head: and so forth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Christes deseruing, we doe not say that in him is the beginning of deseruing, but we climbe vp to the ordinance of God, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediator, to purchase saluation for vs. And so is the deseruing of Christ vnsiftly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one vnder another doe not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans iustification is free by the meere mercy of God, and that there also the deseruing of Christ come betwene which is contained vnder the mercy of God. But against our workes are aptly set, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserue any thing but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because the deseruing of Christ hangeth vpon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deseruing, as that grace, is siftly set against all the workes of men.

² This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten Sonne, that who soeuer beleeueth in him shall not perish. We see how the loue of God holdeth the first place, as the foueraigne cause or original, and then followeth faith in Christ, as the second or neerer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the words may beare. For if we obtaine righteoufnes by faith that resteth vpon him, then is the matter of our saluation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly proued. Not that we first loued him, but he first loued vs, and sent his Sonne to be the appeasing for our sinnes. In these words is clearly shewed, that God to the end that nothing should withstand his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasing, is of great great weight : because God after a certaine vnſpeakable manner, euen the ſame time that he loued vs, was alſo angry with vs, vntill he was reconciled in Chriſt. And to this purpoſe ſerue all thoſe ſayings : He is the ſatisfaction for our finnes. Againe : It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himſelfe, appeaſing himſelfe through the blood of the Croſſe by him, &c. Againe, God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world to himſelfe, not imputing to men their finnes. Againe, he accepted vs in his beloved Sonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the Croſſe. The reaſon of this myſterie is to be fetched out of the firſt Chapter to the Ephesians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were choſen in Chriſt, addeth therewithall, that we haue obtained fauour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the making of the world, but becauſe he vttered his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Chriſt? For ſith God is the fountaine of all righteouſnes, it muſt needs be, that man ſo long as he is a ſinner, haue God his enemy and his Iudge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteouſnes, ſuch as is deſcribed by Paul : He made him that had done no ſinne, to be ſinne for vs, that we might be the righteouſneſſe of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtained free righteouſneſſe by that ſacrifice of Chriſt, that we ſhould pleaſe God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by ſinne eſtranged from him. But this diſtinction is alſo meant ſo oft as the grace of Chriſt is ioyned to the loue of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giueth vs of his owne that which he hath purchaſed : for otherwiſe it would not agree with him, that this praiſe is giuen him ſeuerally from his Father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

3 But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Chriſt by his obedience hath purchaſed vs fauour with his Father. For this I take for a thing confeſſed, that if Chriſt hath ſatisfied for our finnes, if he hath ſuffered the puniſhment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeaſed God, finally, if he being righteous, hath ſuffered for the vnrighteous, then is ſaluation purchaſed for vs by his righteouſneſſe : which is as much in effect as to deſerue it. But, as Paul witneſſeth, we are reconciled and haue receiued reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is : that God, to whom we were hatefull by reaſon of ſinne, is by the death of his Sonne appeaſed, ſo that he might be fauourable vnto vs. And the compariſon of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be noted, as by the tranſgreſſion of one man, many were made ſinners : ſo alſo by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus : As by the ſinne of Adam we were eſtranged from God and ordained to deſtruction, ſo by the obedience of Chriſt we are receiued into fauour as righteous. And the future time of the verbe doth not exclude preſent righteouſnes, as appeareth by the proceſſe of the text : For he had ſaid before, that the free gift was of many finnes vnto iuſtification.

4 But when we ſay, that grace is purchaſed vs by the deſeruing of Chriſt, we meaneth this, that we are cleaned by his blood, and that his death was a ſatisfaction for our finnes. His blood cleaſeth vs from ſinne. This blood is it that is ſhed for remiſſion of ſinne. If this be the effect of his bloodineſſe, that finnes be not imputed vnto vs : it followeth, that with that price the iudgement of God is ſatisfied. To which purpoſe ſeruet that ſaying of Iohn the Baptiſt : Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the ſinne of the world. For he ſereth in compariſon Chriſt againſt all the ſacrifices of the Law, to teach that in him onely was fulfilled that which thoſe figures ſhewed. And we know, what Mofes ech where ſaith : Iniquitie ſhall be cleaned, ſinne ſhall be put away and forgiven. Finally we are very wel taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Chriſt : And this point the Apoſtle ſetteth out in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, very ſidly taking this principle, that remiſſion is not wrought without ſhedding of blood. Whereupon he gathereth, that Chriſt for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. A gaine: that he was offered vp to take away the finnes of many. And he had said before, that not by the blood of goates or of calves, but by his owne blood he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reasoneth: If the blood of a calfe do sanctifie according to the cleannes of the flesh, that much more consciences are cleansed by the blood of Christ from dead workes: it easily appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, vnlesse we graunt vnto his sacrifice the power of cleansing, appeasing and satisfiing. As a litle after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new testament, that they which are called, may receiue the promise of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of finnes going before, which remained vnder the law. But specially it is conuenient to wey the relation which Paul describeth, that he became a curse for vs. &c. For it were superfluous, yea and an absurditie, that Christ should be charged with curse, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, should purchase righteousness for them. Also the testimonie of Esay is plaine, that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon Christ, and that we obtained health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our finnes, it could not haue bene said, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the paine whereunto we were subiect. Wherewith agreeth that which followeth in the same place: For the sinne of my people I haue stricken him. Let vs also recite the exposition of Peter, which shall leaue nothing doubtfull: that he did beare our sinne vpon the tree. For he saith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Christ.

5 And the Apostles do plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ransom to redeeme vs from the guiltines of death. Being iustified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whome God hath set to be the propitiatorie by faith which is in his blood. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, because he hath giuen the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his blood, th it hauing obtained righteousness, we may stand boldly before the iudgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that we are redeemed not by golde and siluer, but by the precious blood of the vnspotted Lambe. For the comparision also would not agree, vnlesse with that price satisfaction had bin made for finnes: for which reason Paul saith that we are preciouslie bought. Also that other saying of his would not stand together. There is one mediator that gaue him selfe to be a redemption, vnlesse the paine had bene cast vpon him which we had deserued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the blood of Christ is the forgiuenesse of finnes: as if he should haue saide, that wee are iustified or acquitted before God, because that blood answereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hand-writing which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant the payment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. There is also great weight in these wordes of Paul: If wee be iustified by the workes of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For heereby wee gather, that wee must fetch from Christ that which the lawe would giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtaine by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he saide: He that doth these things, shall liue in them. Which he no lesse plainly confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleeuing in Christ we are iustified from all those things, from which we could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. For if the keeping of the lawe be righteousness, who can denie that Christ deserued fauour for vs, when taking that burthen vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if wee our selues had kept the lawe? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward writeth to the Galathians: God sent his sonne subiect to the lawe, that he might redeeme those that were vnder the lawe. For to what end serued that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteousness, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousness without works, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousness is reckoned to vs which was found in Christ onely. And truly for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we find in him the substance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousness. As Paul saith, that he gaue himselfe a sacrifice of sweete saour. And in another place: He died for our sins, he rose againe for our iustification. Hereupon is gathered, that not onely saluation is giuen vs by Christ, but also that for his sake his Father is now fauourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt but that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esay saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for Dauid my seruants sake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witness, where he saith: Your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not exprest, yet Iohn after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronoun He. In which sence also the Lord pronounceth. As I liue because of my Father, so shall ye also liue because of me. Wherewith agreeth that which Paul saith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to beleue in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demand, whether Christ deserued for himselfe, (as Lombard, and the other Schoolemen doe) is no lesse foolish curiositie, than it is a rash determination when they affirme it. For what needed the Sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for himselfe? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the Father prouided for the commodity of his Sonne in his deservings, but that he deliuered him to death, and spared him not, because he loued the world. And the Prophets manners of speaking are to be noted, as, A Child is borne to vs. Again: Reioyce thou daughter of Sion: behold thy King commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of loue should be very cold, which Paul setteth out, that Christ suffered death for his enemies. For thereupon we gather, that he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying, I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruite of his holines vnto other, doth thereby testifie that he purchaseth nothing for him selfe. And truly this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to giue him selfe wholie to saue vs, did after a certaine manner forget himselfe. But to this purpose they doe wrongfully draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the Father hath exalted him, and giuen him a name, &c. For by what deservings could man obtaine to be Iudge of the world, and the head of the Angels, and to enioy the soueraigne dominion of God, and that in him should rest that same maiestie, the thousandth part whereof all the powers of men and Angels can not reach vnto? But the solution thereof is easie and plaine, that Paul doth not there intreat of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect ensuing thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behooueth that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glory of Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which entreateth of the maner how to receiue the grace of Christ, and what profits do grow vnto vs, and what effects ensue thereof.

The first Chapter.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, do profit vs by secret working of the holy Ghost.

No benefite commeth by Christs co-vs till the bond of the sp.rie haue vnited vs vnso him.

Ow it is to be seene how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his onely begotten sonne, not for his owne priuate vse, but to enrich them that were without them and needed them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the saluation of mankinde, is vnprofitable, and nothing availeth for vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behooueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, that we are grafted into him, & did put on him. For (as I haue before said) al that euer he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine by this faith: yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by the Gospell, therefore verie reason teacheth vs to climbe vp higher, and to enquire of the secret effectuall working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enioy Christ and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternall godhead and essence of the spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and blood that the spirit should testifie of him, lest the saluation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are alleaged three witnessers in heaven, the Father, the Worde, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twise repeated, which we seele to be engrauen in our hearts in steed of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing and sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the Spirit vnto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Christ. By which words he telleth vs, that to the entent the shedding of that holy blood should not become void, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy Spirit. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and iustification, saith that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy spirit is the bond wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For proofe wherof also do serue all that we haue taught in the last booke befor this, concerning his anointing.

2 But that this, being a matter especially worthis to be knowen, may bee made more certainly euident, we must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with

The spirit being Christs after a peculiar manner

the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar manner, to the ende that he might seuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirit of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appereth as well in mankinde as in all other liuing creatures, but also is in vs the root and seed of heauenly life. Therefore the Prophets doe principally commend the kingdome of Christ by this title of prerogative, that then should flourish more plentifull abundance of the spirit. And notable about all the rest is that place of Iohel: In that day I will poure of my Spirit vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seeme to restraine the giftes of the Spirit to the office of a prophesying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the inlightning of his spirit will make those his schollers which before were vnskilful and void of all heauenly doctrine. Now forasmuch as God the Father doth for his sons sake giue vs his holy Spirit, & yet hath left with him the whole fulnes therof, to the end that he should be a minister and distributor of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the Spirit of the Father, and sometime the Spirit of the Sonne. Yee are not (saith Paul) in the flesh, but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any haue not the Spirit of Christ, he is not his. And heereupon he putteth vs in hope of full renuing, for that hee which raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortall bodies, because of his Spirit dwelling in vs. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father be ascribed the praise of his owne gifts, whereof hee is the author: and yet that the same be ascribed to Christ, with whom the gifts of the spirit are left, that he may giue them to those that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirit is distributed to euery one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be knowne, that he is called the Spirit of Christ, not onely in respect that the eternall Worde of God is with the same Spirit ioyned with the Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam giuen from heauen, to bee a quickening Spirit: wherby Paul compareth the singular life that the Sonne of God breatheth into them that be his that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he wisheth to the faithfull the fauor of Christ and the loue of God, he ioyned withall the common partaking of the Spirit, without which no man can taste neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifullnesse of Christ. As also he saith in another place: The loue of God is powred out into our hartes by the holy Spirit that is giuen vs.

3 And here it shall be profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture fetcheth out the holy Spirit, where it entreateth of beginning and whole restoring of our saluation. First, he is called the Spirit of adoption, because he is a witnesse vnto vs of the free good will of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloued onely begotten Sonne, that he might be a Father vnto vs, and doth encourage vs to pray boldly, yea and doth minister vs wordes to crie without feare, Abba, Father: by the same reason hee is called the earnest pledge, and scale of our inheritance, because he so giueth life from heauen to vs wandring in the world, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soule is in safegard vnder the faithfull bearing of God, for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteousnesse. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring forth the buds of righteousnes, he is oftentimes called water as in Isay: All yee that thirst come to the waters. Again: I will poure out my Spirit vpon the thirstie, & floods vpon the dry land: wherewith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did cuen nowe alleage. If any thirst let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezechiel where the Lord promisseth cleane waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as hee restoreth and nourisheth into liuely quicknes, them vpon whom he hath powred the liquour of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oyle and annointment. Again because in continually seething out and burning vp the vices of our lust, he setteth our hartes on fire with the loue of God and zeale of godlines, he is also for this effect woorthily called fire. Finally, he is described vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence do flowe vnto vs all heauenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith hee vseth his power: because by the breath of his power he so breatheth diuine life into vs, that wee are not nowe stirred by our selues, but ruled by his stirring and moouing: so that if there bee anie good things in vs, they be the fruits of his grace: but our owne gifts without him, be darknes of minde, and peruerfenes of hart. This point is set out plainly enough, that till our mindes be bent vpon the holy Ghost, Christ lieth in a maner idle, because we coldly espie him without vs, yea and farre away from vs. But we knowe that he profieth none other but them whose head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, & them which haue put on Him. This conioyning onely maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not vnprofitably with the name of Sauour. And for prooffe hereof serueth that holy marriage, whereby wee are made flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirit onely he maketh himselfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same spirite we are made his members, so that hee containeth vs vnder him, and we againe possesse him.

4 But forasmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the most part referred all those things, that we commonly finde spoken to expresse his force & working: because he bringeth vs into the light of the gofpell by nothing but by faith: as Iohn Baptist teacheth, that this prerogative is giuen to them that beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh & bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh & bloud, he affirmeth it to be a supernaturall gift that they receiue Christ by faith, who otherwise should remain subiect to their own infidelitie. Like whereunto is that answer of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not reuealed it to thee, but my father which is in heauen. These things I do now but shortly touch, because I haue already intreated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise. For Paul sheweth that he is an inward teacher, by whose working the promise of saluation pearceth into our minds, which otherwise should but beare the aire or our eares. Likewise, when he saith, that the Thessalians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the Spirit and beleeuing of the truth: by which ioyning of them together, he briefly admonisheth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing else but from the holie spirit: which thing Iohn setteth out more plainly, saying: Wee know that there abideth in vs of the spirit which he hath giuen vs. Again, by this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath giuen vs of his spirite. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the spirite of truth which the world cannot receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heauenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same spirite this proper office, to put them in minde of those things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should the light shew it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirite of vnderstanding should open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirite, the key by which the treasures of the heauenly kingdome are opened vnto vs: & may call his enlightening, the eyesight of our minde to see. Therefore doth S. Paul so much commend the ministerie of the spirite: because teachers should crie without profiting, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inward master should draw them with his spirite that are giuen him by his Father. Therefore as we haue said, that perfect saluation is founde in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirite and fire, lighting vs into the faith of his Gospell, and so newe begetting vs, that we may be new creatures: and purging vs from vnholie filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

The ij. Chapter.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

BVt all these things shall be easie to vnderstand : when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the Readers may know the force and nature thereof. But first it is conuenient to call to minde againe these things that haue beene already spoken, that sith God doth appoint vs by his law what we ought to do, if we fall in anie point thereof, the same terrible iudgement of eternall death that hee pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Againe, that forasmuch as it is not onely hard but altogether aboue our strength and beyond all our power to fulfill the lawe if we onely beholde our selues, and weigh what estate is woorthie for our deseruings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast away from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdly, this hath beene declared, that there is but one meane of deliniance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie : wherein appeereth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hande it pleased the heauenly father, hauing mercy vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, so that wee with sound faith embrace this mercy, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is conuenient for vs to weigh this, what manner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to bee his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenly kingdome, forasmuch as it is certaine that not euery opinion nor yet euery perswasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and studie must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall propertie of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the error of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the worlde, hearing the name of faith, conceiue no higher thing, but a certaine common assent to the historie of the Gospell. Yea, when they dispute of faith in the schooles, in barely calling god the obiect of faith, they do nothing but (as we haue said in another place) by vaine speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true marke. For whereas God dwelleth in a light that none can attaine to; it behooueth of necessitie that Christ become meane betwene vs & it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, The way, the truth, & the life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountain of life) but by him: because he onely knoweth the Father, & by him the faithful to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason Paul affirmeth, that he accounteth nothing excellent to be knowne, but Christ: & in the xx. chapter of the Acts he saith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place hee bringeth in Christ speaking after this manner, I will send thee among the Gentiles that they may receiue forgiveness of sinnes, and portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in me. And Paul testifieth, that the glorie of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightning of the knowledge of Gods glorie shineth in his face. It is true indeed that faith hath respect onely to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whom he hath sent, euen Iesus Christ. Because God himselfe should haue been secret & hidden farre from vs, yntil the brightnesse of Christ did cast his beames vpon vs. For this intent the father left all that he had with his onely begotten sonne, euen by the communicating of good things with him to expresse the true image of his glorie. For as it is said, that we must be drawn by the spirite, that we may be stirred to seeke Christ; so againe we ought to be admonished, that the inuisible Father is no where else to bee sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently well, which intreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, saith that wee must knowe whither we must goe and which way: and then by and by after he gathereth that the safest way against all errors is he that is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, and man by whom we go: and both these are found nowhere but in Christ. Neither doth Paul when he speaketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrow that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay vpon Christ. And Peter doth most fitly ioyne them both together, saying that by him we beleue in God.

The obiect of faith is not barely God, as the schoolmen coldly dispute, but God displaying himselfe in Christ.

1. Pet. 1. 21.

Faith is no infolded or vnexpressed knowledge.

True faith standeth.

Rom. 10. 10.

Simple men abused when they are made beleuee it is faith indeterminately to holde what the Church holdeth, without further seeking what we haue by Christ at the hands of God and how. Iohn. 17. 3.

2 Therefore this cull, euen as innumerable other, is to bee imputed to the Schoolemen, which haue hidden Christ as it were with a veile drawn before him, to the beholding of whom vnlesse wee be directly bent, wee shall alway wander in many vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they doe deface and in a manner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance dor with great hurr deceiue the silly people, yea (to say truely and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuise doth not onely burie but vterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleuee, to vnderstand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not onely of God, but of the will of God. For neither doe we obtaine saluation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoever the Church appointeth, or that we doe commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to be a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is giuen vs vnto righteousness, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submitting of our sense, we attaine an entree into the kingdom of heauen. For when the Apostle saith, that with the hart we beleuee to righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made to saluation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressedly beleuee that which he vnderstandeth not, nor seeketh to learne: but he requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodness, in which consisteth our righteousness.

3 In deede I denie not (such is the ignorance wherewith wee are compassed) that there now be and hereafter shall be many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till hauing put off the burden of our flesh we come neerer to the presence of God: in which very things that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our iudgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to keepe vnite with the Church. But vnder this colour to intitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God and of Christ, not in reuerence of the Church. And we see what a maze they haue framed with this their hidden implication, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choise, so that it be thrust in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monstrous errors. Which vnaduised lightnesse of beleefe, whereas it is a most certaine downefall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueeth nothing determinately, but with this condition adioyned, If the faith of the Church be such. So doe they faine, that truth is holden in error, light in blindness, true knowledge in ignorance. But because we will not tarry long in consulting them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainnesse of the truth it selfe will of it selfe minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, but they definitiue say that they beleuee aright, which stand amazed in their ignorance; yea and doe flatter themselves therein, so that they doe agree to the authoritie and iudgement of the Church, concerning things ynknownen. As though the Scripture did not euery where teach, that with faith is ioined knowledge.

Our Faith as long as we lue is vnexpressed, if vnexpressed faith be taken for faith

4 But we do grant, that so long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expressed, not onely because many things are yet hidden from vs, but because being compassed with many mists of errors, we attaine not all things. For the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and proceed on further forward with gentle willingness to learne. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithful, if vpon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for reuelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vnclodeth of our flesh, we attaine to knowlesse than were to be wished, and daily in reading we light vpon many darke places which do conuince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth vs in modestie, assigning to euery one a measure of faith, that euen the very best teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpressed faith, we may marke in the Disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightened. We see, how they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did sticke euen in the smallest points, how they hanging at the mouth of their maister did not yet much proceede, yea when at the womens information they ranne to the graue, the resurrection of their maister was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witness of their faith, we may not say that they were vtterly without faith: but rather if they had not bene periuaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him would haue perished in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpes of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleueed his wordes whome they knewe to be a speaker of truth, yet the grossnesse of that full possessed their mindes so wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a manner amased at it. Whereupon it is saide, that they then at the last beleueed when they had by triall of the thing it selfe proued the truth of the wordes of Christ, not that they then began to beleuee, but because the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiuing liuelinesse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christ for their only teacher, and then being taught of him, they deterned that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleueed that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to seeke any more familiar prooffe hereof than this, that in all things alway vnbeleefe is mingled with faith.

5 We may also call it vnexpressed faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelists do rehearse that many beleueed, which only being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but that Christ was the Messias which had bin promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subiection willingly to submit themselves to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deede but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleueed Christs promise, concerning the healing of his son when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth, beleueed againe: because he receiued as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receiue his doctrine. Albeit it is to be known, that he was so tractable & ready to learne, that yet in the first place the word of the beleueing signifieth a particular beleefe: and in the second place inaketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the schollers of Christ. A like example doth John set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleueed the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleuee no: because of thy report, but we haue heard him, & we know that he is the Sauiour of the world. Herby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithful, in deede not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection. But this willingness to learne, with a desire to proceede further, differeth farre from that grosse ignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papists haue imagined. For if Paul seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet mingled with ignorance, of that which should expressly be known and beleueed. Phil. 3. 15.

When we begin by faith to know some things, and haue a desire to learne more, this may be termed an vnexpressed faith.

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receiue him such as he is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to be the marke of our faith, so we cannot goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide vs. And truly there are opened to vs the treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ should little profit vs. So Paul ioyneth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Yee haue not so learned Christ, for yee haue bene taught what is the truth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath bene so much taught by Moses and the Prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath bene deliuered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is woorthily called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also hee saith in another place, that by the comming of faith the lawe is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the newe and vnaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our schoolemaister, hath more plainly set forth the mercie of his father, and more certainly testified of our saluation. Albeit it shall be the more easie and more conuenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generaltie to the specialtie. First we must be put in minde that there is a generall relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more bee seuered from the worde, than the sunne beames from the sunne from whome they proceede. Therefore in Esaie God crieth out: Heare mee and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, Iohn sheweth in these wordes: These things are written that ye may beleue. And the Prophet meaning to exhort the people to beleefe, saith: This day if yee shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to beleue. Moreover, God doth not without cause in Esaie set this marke of difference betweene the children of the Church and strangers, that he will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefite vniuersall to all, why shoulde he direct his wordes to a fewe? Wherewith agreeth this that the Euanglists doe commonly vie the wordes Faithfull and Disciples, as severall wordes expressing one thing, and specially Luke very oft in the Actes of the Apostles. Yea and hee stretcheth that name euen to a woman in the ninth Chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith doe swarue neuer so little from this marke, to which it ought to be directly leuelled, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becometh an vncertaine lightnesse of beleefe and wandring error of minde. The same Word is the foundation wherewith faith is ypholden and sustained, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. We doe not here dispute whether the ministerie of man bee necessaric to sowe the Worde of God that faith may be conceiued thereby, which question we will elsewhere intreate of: but we say that the Word it selfe, howsoeuer it be conueyed to vs, is like a mirrour when faith may beholde God. Whether God doth therein vse the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne onely power, yet he doth alway shewe himselfe by his Word to those, whome his will is to drawe vnto him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is giuen to the Gospell Rom. 1. And in another place hee praiseth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the onely purpose in the vnderstanding of faith, that we knowe that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we vnderstand what will he beareth vs. For it not so much behooueth vs to knowe what he is in himselfe, but what a one he will be to vs. Now therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of Godd, perceiued by the worde. And the foundation hercof is a foreconceiued persuasion of the truth of God. Of the assurednesse whercof so long as thy minde shall dispute with it selfe, the word shall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credite at all. But also it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, speaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnlesse thou further holde this for vn-doubtedly determined, that whatsoeuer proceedeth from him, is the sacred and in-oliable truth.

7 But because not at every word of God mans heart is raised vp to faith, we must yet further search what this faith in the word hath properly respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The blood of thy brother crieth to mee out of the earth. Yet these are such sayings as of them selues can do nothing but shake faith, so much like are they able to stablish faith. We denie not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how oft soeuer, whatsoeuer, and in what sort soeuer it spea-keth: but now our question is onely, what faith findeth in the word of the Lord to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation and ven-geance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how should it but flee God, of whom it is affraide? But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we haue not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accounted for faith, to knowe the will of God, of what sort soeuer it be: But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the message is sorrowfull and the declara-tion dreadfull, we put kindnesse or mercie? Truly so we shall come neerer to the na-ture of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that we haue learned that saluation is laide vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that he hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a pro-mise of grace, whereby he may testifie that he is our mercifull father, for that other-wise we cannot approach vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Psalmes these two things Mercie and Truth do cleaue together, because neither should it any thing profit vs to know that God is true, vnlesse he did mercifully allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to em-brace his mercie, vnlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy saluation, I haue not hidden thy goodnesse and thy truth. Thy good-nes and thy truth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heaucens, thy truth euen to the cloudes. Againe: All the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his covenant. Againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the truth of the Lord abideth for euer. Againe: I will sing to thy name vpon thy mercie and truth. I omit that which is in the Prophets to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For wee shall rashly determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe do testifie of himselfe, and preuent vs with his call-ing, least his will should be doubtful and vnknown. But we haue alreadie seene, that Christ is the only pledge of his loue, without whome on euerie side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Now forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much preuaile, vnlesse he make vs to rest in it, therefore such an vnderstand-ing is to be banished, as is mingled with doubting, and doth not foundlie agree in it selfe, but as it were, disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is far from attaining and climbing vp to perceiue the verie will of God: and also the hart of man, as it wauereth with perpetuall doubting, is far from resting assured in that persuasion. Therefore it behooueth both that our wit be lightened, and our heart strengthened by some other meane, that the word of God may be of full credite with vs. Now we shall haue a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a stedfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnes toward vs, which being grounded vpon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both reueiled to our mindes, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceede anie further, it shall be necessarie that I make some preambles to dissolve certain doubts that otherwise might make some stop to the readers. And first I must confute that distinction that flyeth about in the schooles, betweene betweene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, doe beleeuē all that is necessarīe to saluation. As though the holy Ghost in lightning our hearts vnto faith, were not a witness to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they giue the name of faith to such persuasion voide of the feare of God. We neede to striue no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the worde of God. Whereby shall plainly appeere how vnskillfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue already touched part, the rest I will adde hereafter as place shall serue. At this present I say that there cannot be imagined a greater absurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They will haue faith to be an assent, whereby euery despiser of God may receiue that which is vttered out of the Scripture. But first they should haue seen whether euery man of his owne power doe bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witness of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly play the fooles, in demanding whether faith which a qualitie added doth forme, be the same faith or an other and a new faith. Whereby appeereth certainly, that in so babbling they neuer thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleeuing doth already containe in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul: With the hart is beleeued to righteousnesse, they would cease to saie that same colde qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should be sufficient to ende this contention: that the very same assent (as I haue already touched, and will againe more largely repeate) is rather of the hart than of the braine, rather of affection than of vnderstanding. For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, which is such as the Lorde preferreth no kinde of obedience about it: and that woorthily, for as much as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as Iohn the Baptist witnesseth, the beleeuers doe as it were subscribe and seale vnto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull we doe in one word determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that faith is formed by adding of godly affection vnto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is another plainer argument that offereth it selfe to be alleaged. For whereas faith imbraceth Christ as he is offered vs of the father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesse, forgiveness of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of liuing water: without doubt no man can euer truly know him, vnlesse he doe therewithall receiue the sanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man desire to haue it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot be known but with sanctification of his spirite: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be seuered from godly affection.

1. Cor. 12. 10.*

9 Whereas they are wont to lay this against vs, that Paul saith: If a man haue all faith, so that he remooue mountaines, if he haue not charitie, he is nothing: whereby they would deforme faith, in spoyling it of charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the diuers giftes of the holy Ghost, among the which he had reckoned the diuers kindes of languages, power and propheticke, and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the best of these giftes, that is to say, such giftes whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole bodie of the Church: he straightway saide further, that hee would shewe them yet a more excellent way. That all such giftes, howe excellent soeuer they bee of themselves, yet are they nothing to be esteemed, vnlesse they serue charitie. For they were giuen to the edifying of the Church, and vnlesse they be applied thereunto, they loose their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearseth them repeating the selfe same giftes that hee had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all

all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether yee call it power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which euery vngodly man may both haue and abuse, as the gift of tongues, as prophetic and other gifts of grace: it is no maruell if it be seuered from charitie. But all the error of these men standeth in this, that where this word Faith, hath diuers significations, they not considering the diuersitie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of Iames which they alleage for maintenance of the same error, shall be else where discussed. But although for teachings sake, when we meane to shew what maner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are diuers sorts of faith: yet we acknowledge and speake of but one faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many in deede doe beleuee that there is a God, they thinke that the historie of the Gospel and other parts of the scripture are true (as commonly we are wont to iudge of such things, as either are reported being done long agoe, or such as we our selues haue bene present at and seene.) There be also some that go further, for both they beleuee the word of God to be a most assured oracle, and they do not altogether despise his commandements, and they somwhat after a sort are moued with his threatnings and promises. It is indeed testified that such haue faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they do not with open vngodlines fight against the word of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shew of obedience.

10 But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not woorthie of the name of faith. From the sound truth whereof how farre it differeth, although it shall be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is said, that Simon Magus beleueed, which yet within a litle after bewrayed his owne vnbeleefe. And whereas it is saide that he beleueed, we do not vnderstand it as some do, that he fained a beleefe when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being ouercome with the maiestie of the Gospel, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is said in the Gospel of Luke, that they beleuee for a time, in whom the seed of the word is choaked vp before it bring forth fruit, or before it take any roote at all, it by and by withereth away and perisheth: we doubt not that such delited with a certaine taste of the word do greedily receiue it, and begun to feele the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfeiting of faith, they beguile not onely other mens eyes, but also their owne mindes. For they perswade themselves, that that reuerence which they shew to the word of God, is most true godlines, because they thinke that there is no vngodhnesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his word. But what maner of assent soeuer that be, it pearceth not to the verie heart to remaine there stablished: and though sometime it seemeth to haue taken rootes, yet those are not luely rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanitie, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guilefull hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueh himselfe. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith vnderstand, that therein they are no better than the Diuell. But that first sort of men are farre woorse than the Diuell, which do senselesly heare and vnderstand those things, for knowledge whereof the Diuels do tremble. And the other are in this point equal with the diuell, that the feeling such as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth only to terrour and discouragement.

11 I know that some thinke it hard, that wee assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is easily dissolued: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor do truly feele the effectual working of the Gospel, but they that are foreordained to saluation: yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime moued with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne iudgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no aburditie, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the taste of the heauenly gifts, that Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceiue the spiritual force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lord, the more to condemn them and make them inexcusable, conuayeth himselfe into their mindes so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If any object, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithful whereby to proue certainly their adoption: I answer that though there be a great likenes and affinitye betweene the elect of God and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onely that affiance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seede for euer, so that the seede of life planted in their harts neuer perisheth. so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferior working of the Spirite may haue his course, euen in the reprobate. In the mean season the faithfull are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themselues, least in steed of assurednes of faith, do creepe in carelesse confidence of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobate do neuer conceiue but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow than of the sound bodie, because the holy spirit doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect onely, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their vse. But yet it is truly said, that the reprobate beleuee God to be mercifull vnto them, because they receiue the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the selfe same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, vnder a cloke of hypocrisie. And I denie not, that God doth so far giue light vnto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the sound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shew himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that he hauing truly deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his safegard, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercy. But he vouchsafeth to graunt to the onely elect the liuely roote of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that objection answered, if God do truly shew his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually stablished, for that there is no cause to the contrarie, but that God may enlighten some with a present feeling of his grace, which afterward vanisheth away.

Picked men who by reason of a vanishing sweetness which they feele in the grace of God towards the for a time, are said to beleuee, yet indeed do neither embrace the truth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away: Like as a tree that is not planted deepe ynough to take liuely rootes, in proesse of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeeres it bringeth forth not onely blossomes and leaues but also fruit. Finally, as by the fall of the first man, the image of God might haue bene blotted out of his minde, and soule, so it is no maruell, if God doe shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterward he suttlereth to be quenched. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that he may lightly ouerwash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to bee holden for truth, that howe small and weake

12 Also though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindnesse toward vs, and an assured perswasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no maruell that the feeling of Gods lone in temporall things doth vanish away: which although it haue an affinitye with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I graunt, the will of God is vchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I denie that the reprobate do proceed so farre as to attaine vnto that secreete reuelation, which the Scripture sayeth to belong to the elect onely. Therefore I denie that they doe either conceiue the will of GOD as it is vchangeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away: Like as a tree that is not planted deepe ynough to take liuely rootes, in proesse of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeeres it bringeth forth not onely blossomes and leaues but also fruit. This is in the meane time to bee holden for truth, that howe small and weake faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the spirite of God, and a seale of their adoption, the print thereof can neuer bee blotted out of their harts: as for the reprobate, that they are ouerspred with such a light as after ward comerth to nought, and yet the Spirite is not deceitful, because he giueth not life to the seed that he casteth in their harts, to make it abide alwaies incorruptible, as hee doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is euident by the teaching of the Scripture and by daily experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needes be that there is raised in their harts a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time there liued in Saul a godly affection to loue God, by whom he knew himselfe to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetenesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so do they not soundly loue him againe as his children, but are ledde with a certaine affection like hired seruants. For to Christ onelie was the spirite of loue giuen, to this ende, that hee shoulde poure it into his members. And truly that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onely. The loue of God is powred abroad into our harts by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs, euen the same loue that engendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrarie side we see God to be maruellously angrie with his children, whom yet he ceaseth not to loue: not that in himselfe he hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of flesh, to shake off their drounsinesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore all at one time they conceiue him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not fainedly doe praie to appease his wrath, to whome yet they flee with quiet assured trust. Heereby it appeereth that it is not true that some doe counterfaite a shew of faith, which yet do lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodaine violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishnesse so possideth them, that they doe not well examine their hart as they ought to haue done. It is likelie that they were such to whome (as Iohn witnesseth) Christ did not commit himselfe when yet they beleeued in him, because hee knew them all, and knew what was in man. If manie did not fall from the common faith (I call it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse and affinitie with the liuely and continuing faith) Christ woulde not haue said to his Disciples: If yee abide in my worde, then are yee truly my Disciples, and yee shall knowe the truth, and the truth shall make you free. For hee speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishnesse quench the light that is giuen them. Therefore doth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they haue not taken liuely roote. Like as Christ also saith in Matthew: euery tree that my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kinde of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. James inuertieth against that kinde of men, that with deceitfull pretence do wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paul require of the children of God a faith vnfaigned, but in respect that many do presumptuously challenge vnto themselues that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deceit do beguile other or sometime themselues. Therefore he compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein faith is kept, because manie in falling from good conscience, haue suffered shipwracke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the worde faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sound doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now alludge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will haue Deacons to holde fast the mysterie of faith in a pure conscience. of certaine from the faith. But on the other side he sayeth that Timothie was nourished vp with the words of faith. Againe, where he sayeth that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that many depart from the faith: whom in another place he calleth reprobate touching Faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, saying, Warne them that they be found in the Faith. By soundnesse he meanneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easily corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Euen because in Christ, whom Faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: therefore Faith is worthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heauenly doctrine, from which it cannot be seuered. Contrariwise sometime it is restrained to signifie some particular object, as when Matthew saith, that Christ saw the Faith of them that did let downe the Man sicke of the Palsie through the tiles: and Christ himselfe crieth out that he found not in Israell so great Faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earnestly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onely assent and answer of Christ, he required not Christes bodily presence, therefore in respect of this circumstance his Faith was so much commended. And a little here before we haue shewed, that Paul taketh Faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue that neither are regenerate by the spirite of God, nor doe hartly worship him. Also in an other place he setteth Faith for the doctrine whereby we are instructed in Faith. For where he writeth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministerie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these formes of speech standeth a proportionall relation. But when the name of Faith is vnproperly remoued, to signifie a false profession, or a lying title of Faith, that should seeme to be as hard a figuratiue abuse, as when the feare of God is set for a corrupt and wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes said in the holy History, that the forraigne nations which had bene transplanted into Samaria and the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods and the God of Israell, which is as much, as to mingle heauen and earth together. But now our question is, What is that Faith which maketh the children of God different from the vnbelieuers, by which we call vpon God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall saluation and life dwelleth in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I haue shortly and plainly declared.

¶ 14. Now let vs againe goe through all the parts of it, euen from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doubtfull. When in defining Faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men vse to haue of those things that are subiect to mans vnderstanding. For it is so far aboue it, that mans wit must goe beyond and surmount it selfe to come vnto it, yea, and when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it seeketh, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiuech not, it vnderstandeth more by the very assurednesse of perswasion, than if it did with mans owne capacitie thoroughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith very well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, breadth, depth, and height, and to know the loue of Christ that far surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiuech by Faith, is euery way infinite, and that this kind of knowledge is far higher than all vnderstanding. But yet because the Lord hath disclosed to his Saintes the secret of his will which was hidden to many ages and generations, therefore by good reason Faith is in Scripture sometime called on a knowledging: and Iohn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where hee testifieth, can the Faithfull doe certainly know that they are the children of God. And vndoubtedly they know it assuredly. but rather by being confirmed by perswasion of Gods truth, than by being informed by naturall demonstration. And this also the dering abroad from the Lord, because we walke by Faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we vnderstand by Faith, are yet absent from vs and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of Faith standeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

15 We further call it a sure and stedfast knowledge, to expresse thereby a more found constancie of persuasion. For as Faith is not contented with a doubtfull and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke and entangled vnderstand-ing: but requireth a full and fixed assurednes, such as men are wont to haue of things found by experience and prooued. For vnbeleefe sticketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is Faithfull, no man is without great contention perswa-ded in his hart. Specially when he commeth to the prooffe, then the wauering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture writteth of notable titles of commendation mainteining the authoritie of the word of God, but endeoureth to giue remedie for the foresaid disease, that God may obtaine to be fully beleueed of vs in his promises: The words of the Lord (saith Da-uid) are pure words, as the Siluer tried in a fornace of earth, fined seuen times. Again, The word of the Lord is as a shield to all that trust in him. And Saion confirming the same, and in a manner in the same words, saith: Euerie word of God is pure.
 But such the whole 119. Psalme entreateth onely in a manner vpon the same, it were superfluous to alleadge any moe places. Truly so oft as God doth so commend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the way reproch vs with our vnbeleeuings: because that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to roote vp al percuise doub-tings out of our hearts. There be also many which so conceiue the mercie of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be euen therewithall pinched with a miserable carefullnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enlose within too narrow boundes the very same mercifullnesse, of which they thinke themselues most assuredly perswaded. For thus they thinke with themselues, that his mercie is in deede great and plentifull poured out vpon manie, offering it selfe and ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it will extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an halfe. Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with assured quietnes, as it doth trouble it with v quieter doubtfulness. But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to Faith, euen such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of doubt. And that cannot be, but that we must needs truly seele & prooue in our selues the sweetenes thereof. And therefore the Apostle out of Faith deriueth assured confidence, and out of it againe boldnes. For thus he saith, that by Christ we haue boldnes, and an entrance with confidence, which is through Faith in him. By which wordes truly he sheweth, that it is no right Faith, but when wee are bolde with quiet mindes to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnes proceedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good will and our saluation. Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is vsed for Confidence.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefe stay of our Faith, that we doe not thinke the promises of mercy which the Lord offereth to be true onely in other beside vs, and not at all in our selues: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our owne. From hence proceedeth that confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, vnlesse some had rather say, that Peace is deriued of it.
 It is an assurednes that maketh the Conscience quiet and chearfull before God, without which the Conscience must of necessitie be vexed, and in a manner torne in peeces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it doe forget God and it selfe, and so slumber a little while. And I may truly say, For a little while, for it doth not long enioy that miserable forgetfulness, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods iudgement sharply tormented. Briefely, there is none truly faithfull, but hee that being perswaded with a sound assurednesse that God is his mercifull and louing father, doth promise him selfe all things vpon trust of Gods goodnesse: and none but he that trusting vpon the promises of Gods good will toward him, conceiueth an vndoubted looking for of saluation: as the Apostle sheweth in these words: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kingdome of heauen, There is none (I say) faithfull, but he that leaning vpon the assurednesse of his owne saluation, doth confidently triumph vpon the Deuill and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am perswaded (saith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate vs from the loue of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Iesu. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane well lightened, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And each where his common manner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no otherwise we do not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, vnlesse we gather of it the fruite of great assurednesse.

*We haue no such reassurie of faith
as is free from being shaken with feares & terrors.*

17 But (some man will say) the faithfull do finde by experience a farre other thing within themselues, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not only tempted with vnquietnesse, which oftentimes chanceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grieuous terrors: so great is the vehemency of temptations to throw downe their mindes: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we wil haue our aforesaid doctrine to stand. But truly, when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, we do not imagine such a certaintie as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is assailed with no carefulnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulness. So farre be we from settling their consciences in such a peaceable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sort soeuer they be afflicted, they do neuer fall & depart from that assured confidence which they haue conceiued of the mercy of God. The scripture setteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, specially if a man beholde the whole continuall course of his life. But yet how he was not alway of quiet minde him selfe declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reprocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angrie with his owne vnbeleeuingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (saith he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truly that same discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, euen as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in another place we reade a larger confession thereof, where he saith: I said in my ouerthrow, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in another place he disputeth with himselfe in carefull and miserable perplexity yea and quarrelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath God forgotten to haue mercy? will he cast off for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue said, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the highest. For, as in despaire he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not only confesseth himselfe to be tossed with doubting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaueeth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forsaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had found found by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waues. And yet (which is maruellous) in all these assaults, Faith vpholdeth the hartes of the godly, and is truly like vnto a Date tree to enduor and rise vpward against al burdens, how great soeuer they be: as Dauid when he might seeme to be vterly ouerwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, ceaseth not to rise vp to God. And truly he that striuing with his owne weakenesse, resorteth to Faith in his troubles, is already in a manner conqueror. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lord, be strong, he shall strengthen thy hart: waite for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearefulness, and in repeating that same twice, confesseth himselfe to be sometimes subiect to many troublesome motions. And in the meane time he doth not onely become displeas'd with himselfe in these faultes, but earnestly endeouoreth to amendment. Truly if we will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achaz, there shall be found great difference, Esay was sent to bring remedy to the carefull grieffe of the wicked King and hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these words: Be in safegard and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before saide, that his hart was moued as the trees of the wood are shaken with wind, though he heard the promise, yet he ceased not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of vnbeleefe, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God, that doth not open to himselfe the gate by Faith. Contrariwise the faithfull whō the waighty burden of temptations maketh to stoupe, and in a maner oppresseth, doe constantly rise vp, although not without trouble and hardnes. And because they know their owne weakenes, they pray with the Prophet: Take not the word of truth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that sometime they become dumme as though their Faith were vterly cuerthrowen, yet they faint not, nor turne their backs, but proceed in their battell, and with prayer doe encourage their slouthfulness, least by fauouring themselues they should grow to vn sensible dulnes.

Esay 7. 3.

Psal. 119. 43.

18 For the vnderstanding thereof, it is needefull to returne to that diuision of the flesh and the spirite, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearly appeare. The godly hart therefore feelth a diuision in it selfe, which is partly delited with sweetenesse by acknowledging the goodnesse of God, and partly grieued with bitternes by feeling of his owne miserie, partly resteth vpon the promise of the Gospel, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimony of his own wickednesse: partly reioyseth with conceiuing of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation commeth by imperfection of Faith, forasmuch as we neuer be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulness to be altogether filled and possessed with faith. Hereupon proceed those battels, when the distrustfulness that abideth in the remnaunts of the flesh, riseth vp to assaile the Faith that is inwardly conceued. But if in a faithfull minde assurednesse be mixed with doubtfulnesse, come we not alway to this point, that Faith standeth not in a certaine and cleare knowledge, but in a darke and doubtfully entangled knowledge of Gods will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diuersly drawne with sundrie thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by seuered from Faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp and downe of distrustfulness, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomles depth thereof: and though we be shaken, yet be we not thrust downe out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battell, that Faith doth at length with wrastling ouercome those hard troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

*Faith wrastling with distrustful-nesse doth alway

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of Faith, be it neuer so small, is poured into our hartes, we by and by begin to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and louing toward vs: yet the same we see from a far off, and far distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceued. From thence forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come vnto so much the neerer, and therefore certainer beholding of him, and by verie continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by litle and litle is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkely seeing that which shee seeth, but that she enjoyeth a cleere knowledge of Gods will towards her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shining in fadelong at a narrow window, or as it were but halfe glimmering, he watech in deed the free beholding of the sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an vndoubted brightnesse thereof, and receiue the vse of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoeuer we be on each side shadowed with much darknes, yet are we sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect assurednes, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it be but a litle, to shew forth his mercy.

in faith.*

Our faith vnperfect but steadfast, though our hearts be both naturally inclined, and also partly by outward reasons, partly by inward guiltines of conscience prouoked to distrustfulness.
1. Cor. 13 9.
2. Cor. 3. 18.

20 Both these points the Apostle verie well teacheth in diuers places. For when he saith, that we know vnperfectly, and prophetic vnperfectly, and see by a darke speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a litle portion of the true godly wise dome is giuen vs in this present life. For though those wordes do not expressly shew that our faith is vnperfect so long as we grone vnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection that we haue need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be comprehended by our small capacite, and narrow compass. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dulnes is an hinderance and stay that he cannot come so neere as were to be wished. But how sure and vndeceivable a taste of it selfe, euen a small drop of faith doth make vs feeble, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Goddell we beholde the glorie of God with vncouered face, hauing no veile betwene vs and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doubting and fearefull trembling, specially so far as our heart, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selfe, is inclined to vnbeleeuings. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and diuers in kinde, do oftentimes with great sodaine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauie burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament and grone with it selfe, and sometime accuse it it selfe: sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduersities doe shewe an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth find in it selfe any prooffe or matter of his wrath, from thence vnbeleefe doth take weapons and engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, should both not hope for any helpe at his hand, and also be afraine of him as of our deadly enemy.

How faith being assaulted getteth the victorie, and remaineth still unconquered.

21 To beare these assaults, faith doth arme and fortifie her selfe with the word of God. And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enemy, because hee is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he punisheth he is also mercifull, because his chastisement cometh rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that God is a reuenger of iniuries, against that stroke he setteth his pardon ready for all offences, so oft as the sinner resorteth to the mercifullnesse of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoeuer it be in marvellous wise toiled and vexed, yet at length riseth vp aboute all dangers, and neuer suffereth the confidence of Gods mercie to be plucked away from it. But rather whatsoeuer contentions do trouble and wearie it, in the ende they tune to the assurednesse of this confidence.

confidence. And hereof this is a prooffe: that the holy ones, when they thinke themselves most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet euen then doe make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then neuertheless they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make them mone to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would neuer finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleued that there were some helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their finalnes of faith, complained in deede that they perished, but yet they called to him for helpe. And when he rebuked them for their small faith, yet he doth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleeuers, but strengeth them to shake off that fault. Therefore we affirme againe that which we haue aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly hart, but sticketh so fast in the bottom, that howsoeuer it be shaken and seeme to bend this way or that way, the light thereof is so neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidden vnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the word which is an vncorruptible seede, bringeth forth fruite like to it selfe, the spring whereof doth neuer wither and vtterly perish. For whereas this is the extreme matter of despaire to the holie ones, to feele according to the consideration of present things, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Iob affirmeth that his hope shall proceede so farre, that though God doe kill him, yet he will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore. Vnbeleefe reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardly assaileth them: neither doth she deadly wounde them with her weapons, that is, easily troubleth them, or so hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, serueth vs for a shield that being holden vp against weapons, can receiue the force of them, that it either vterly driueth them backe, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they cannot pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remoue his foote, and giue ground a litle: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not stricken through. For alway the godlie minde will attune to rise thus hie as to say with David, if I walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is indeed terrible to walke in the darknes of death, and it cannot bee but that the faithfull, howe much strength soeuer they haue, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, whither they haue God present with them, and providing for their safetie, that feare is overcome with assurdenes. For (as Augustine saith) how great engines soeuer the deuill raiseth vp against vs, so long as hee possideth not the place of the hart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if we may iudge by the successe, the faithfull not onely escape safefrom euery battle, so that by and by receiuing fresh courage they are ready to come againe into the field: but also that is fulfilled which Iohn saith in his canonick Epistle: This is the victory that ouercometh the worlde, euen your faith. For he affirmeth that it shall not onely winne the victorie in one or few battels, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the ouer hande of the whole world, although it be a thousand times assailed.

22 There is another kinde of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assurdenes of faith is to nothing at all diminished, that therby it is the more soundly established. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learne by, do carefullly beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselves with the same offences: or recording with themselves their own miserie, do learne to hang altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselves to be more sickle and sooner vanishing than any blast of wande. For when the Asseking; in setting forth the the scourges wherewith the Lord in old time had punished the people of Israell, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they intangle not themselues with like cuils: hee doth not thereby abate their affiance, but onely shaketh away the dulnes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strengthened. And when he taketh occasion of the Iewes fall to exhort him that standeth, to take heede that he fall not, he doth not therby bid vs to wauer, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnes, but onely he taketh away arrogant presumption and rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles being receiued into their place, should not too much outrageously triumph against them. Albeit he speaketh there not onely to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried onely in outward shewe. For neither doth he admonish euerie man particularly, but making a comparison betweene the Iewes and the Gentiles, after that he had shewed that the Iewes in this that they were reiected, did suffer iust iudgement for their vnbeleefe and vnthankfulnesse, he also exhorted the Gentiles that they should not, by being proude and extolling themselves, loose the grace of adoption lately conuered into them. But as in that generall reiecting of the Iewes, there remained yet some that were not fallen from the covenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed vp onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, and so abuse Gods louing kindnes to their owne destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon shall follow no inconuenience. For it is one thing to holde downe the rash presumption which out of the remnants of the flesh creepeth sometime euen into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outrageously wanton: and another thing to strike the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednes in the mercy of God.

Rom. 11. 22.

We may feare at the consideration of our owne frailtie and corruption, and yet in his mercie rest with sure and certaine confidence.
Phil. 1. 12.
Psal. 5. 8.

23 Then, when he teacheth, that with feare and trembling we should worke our own saluation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustome vs with much abasing of our selues, reuerently to looke vp into the mightines of God. For truly nothing doth so much awake vs to cast all our confidence and assurance of minde vpon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selues and carefulesnes conceived by knowledge in conscience of our owne wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where he comely conioyneth the boldnes of faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent feare, which we must needs feele so oft as comming into the sight of Gods maiestie, wee perceiue by the glorious brightnes thereof, how great is our owne filthines. And Salomon saith truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne hart afraid, for by hardning therof men fall headlong into euil. But such feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not such whereby we should be troubled and vtterly fall: euen such a feare as when the minde confounded in it selfe, doth recover it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it reuiueth by trust in him. Therefore there is no cause to the contrarie, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured comfort, in respect that sometime they turne their eyes to behold their own vanitie, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde vpon the truth of God. But how (will some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? Euen thus, as contrarily vn sensible dulnesse, and carefulesnes. For whereas the wicked trauaile to procure to ymselfe a want of greefe, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the iudgement of God so perseth them, that they cannot attain that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humilitie, that in fighting valiantly, they may restrain themselves vnder the bridle of modestie. And by the proceffe of the text it appeareth, that this was the intent of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of feare, and trembling to be the good

good pleasure of God, whereby he giueth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to go through with it. According to this meaning ought wee to take that saying of the Prophet: The children of Israell shall feare God and his goodnesse: because notionely godlines engendreth the reuerence of God, but the verie sweetenes and plesant taste of grace, filleth man being discouraged in himselfe with feare and admiration, to make him hang vpon God, and humblie yeelde himselfe subiect to his power.

24 Yet we do not heereby make roome to that most pestilent Philosophy, which many halfe papists at this day begin to coine in coners. For, because they cannot defend that grosse doubtfulness which hath bene taught in schooles, they flie to another deuise, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfulness. They confesse, that so oft as we looke vnto Christ, we finde in him full matter to hope well: but because we are alwaies vnwoorthie of those good things that are offered vs in Christ, they would haue vs to wauer and stagger in beholding our owne vnwoorthines. Breeflie, they place conscience so betweene hope and feare, that it altreth from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courses: and they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is pressed downe, when the one ariseth, the other againe falleth. So when Sathan seeth that those open engines where-with before time he was wont to destroy the assurednes of faith, doe now nothing preuaile, he endeuoureth by crooked vnderminings to ouerthrow it. But what maner of confidence shall that be, which shall now & then yeeld to desperation? If (say they) thou consider Christ, there is assured saluation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assured damnation. Therefore of necessitie distrust and good hope must by enterchangeable courses raigne in thy minde: As though wee ought to imagine Christ standing a farr off, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for saluation at his hande, not because he appeereth a farr off vnto vs, but because hee hath grafted vs into his bodie, and so maketh vs partakers not onely of all his good things, but also of himselfe. Therefore I turne this their argument against themselves: if thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good things is by way of communicating so giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteousnesse drowneth thy finnes, his saluation taketh away thy damnation: he by his woorthinesse commeth betweene thee and God, that thy vnwoorthinesse come not in the sight of God. Breefly, this is the truth: wee ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor vs from him, but with both handes to holde fast that fellowship whereby he hath coupled himselfe vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The bodie indeed (faith he) is dead by reason of sinne: but the spirite of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for righteousnes. According to these mens trisling deuise he shoulde haue saide, Christ indeed hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remaine subiect to death and damnation. But he saith farr otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deserue of our selues, is swallowed vp by the saluation of Christ: and to prooue it, he vseth the same reason that I haue alleaged, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaueth vnto vs not onely with vndiuidable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine maruellous communion daily more and more groweth with vs into one bodie, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue saide a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weakenesse thereof is among violent sodaine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke miste of temptation the light thereof is choked, but whatsoever happeneth, it ceaseth not from endeuour to seeke God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposely intreateth of this question in his list Homilie in the dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I saie) by the benefite of God studying vpon the soule, mee thinke I finde in it two things as it were contrarie. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truly of it, than that it is vterly brought to naught. What neede I now to reckon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, couered with darknesse, entangled with deceitfull entisements, itching with lustes, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway inclined to euill, bent to all kindes of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnesse of it being looked vpon by the light of truth be founde like a cloth stained with floures, then what shall the vnrightheousnesse thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darknesse, how great shall the very darknesse be? What then? without doubt man is made like vnto vanitie: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But how then is he vterly nothing whom God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, towarde whome Gods hart is set? Brethren, let vs take hart againe. Though we be nothing our owne harts, peradventure there may somewhat of vs lie hidden in the hart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, how dost thou set thy hart toward vs? For thy hart is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Euen before thee, not within thee: so in the iudgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of themselues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the works of righteousness, but of him that calleth. And then hee saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is maruellous. Truly those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declareth in these words. Now if with both these considerations wee diligently looke vpon our selues what we bee, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peradventure it is more increased. Truly it is perfectly stablished, that we glorie not in our selues but in the Lord. If we thinke thus: If he hath determined to saue vs we shall by and by be deliuered: new in this we may take courage. But let vs climbe vp into a higher watch tower, and seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, we I say be but in the hart of God. We be, but by his allowing as woorthie, not by our owne woorthinesse.

26. Now, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in euery place witness is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisdom, and in some places wisdom it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reuerence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore he that will truly worship him, will endeavour to shew himselfe both an obedient sonne and a seruiceable seruant vnto him. The obedience that is giuen to him as to a father, the Lord by the Prophet calleth honour: the seruice that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (saith he) honoureth the father, and the seruant the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoever he putteth difference betwene them, thou see'st how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be vnto vs a reuerence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one minde receiue both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, he hath cause enough, although there were no helles at all, why he should dread his displeasure more greuously than any death. But also (such is the wantonnesse of our flesh to run to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restraine the same by all means, wee ought therewithall to take holde

of this thought, that the Lord vnder whose power we liue, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in liuing wickedly do prouoke his wrath against themselves.

27. But that which Iohn saith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie casteth out feare, because feare conceiveth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might do it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they feare his wrath, because they thinke that it hangeth ouer them, for that they looke euery moment when it shall fall vpon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is aboue saide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang ouer their necks, but they are made the more warie not to procure it. So saith the Apostle when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceived: for this commeth the wrath of God vpon the children of vnbeliefe. He threatneth not that Gods wrath will come vpon them, but putteth them in mind to thinke vpon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doings as he had recited, that they themselves should not be willing also to proue it. Albeit it seldom happeneth, that the reprobare be awakened with onely and bare threatnings, but rather being already grosse and vnsensible dull with their owne hardnes, so oft as God thundreth from heauen they harden themselves to obstinacy, but when they are once stricken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a seruill feare: and in comparison set it for contrary to free natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other do suddenly thrust in a middle land, because that same seruill and constrained affection sometime to subdueth mens mindes, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Now we vnderstand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to haue respect, the possession of saluation and eternal life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is fauourable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of saluation, when he himselfe doth assure vs of his loue. Let him shew his face (saith the Prophet) and we shall be safe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to be the summe of our saluation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs, there remaineth no perill, but that all things shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, having taken hold of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life, and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either the length or honor or wealth of his life, forasmuch as God willed none of these things to be appointed vnto vs, but is contented with this assurednesse, that God will neuer faile how soeuer many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the cheefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the word of God. But whatsoever miseries and calamities betide vnto them whome God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when we did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, we named the fauour of God, out of which spring doe flowe vnto vs all kindes of good things. And this we may commonly note throughout the Scriptures, that whensoever mention is made not onely of eternal saluation, but also of any good thing in vs, we be alway called backe to the loue of God. For which cause Dauid saith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doe flowe vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and wee bee vncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shall be accursed, and therefore miserable:

What feare it is which perfect charitie casteth out.

miserable : But if the fauourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, euen our very miseries shall be blessed, because they are turned to helpes of our saluation. As Paul, when he heapeth vp a rehearsal of all aduersities, yet he glorieth that he was not by them seuered from the loue of God: and in his praiers he alway beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewise Dauid setteth the onely fauour of God against all the terrors that trouble vs. If (saith he) I shall walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes doe wauer, vnlesse being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is saide in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord, and the nation whom he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

29 We make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of God, because faith properly staieth vpon it. For though faith doe beleue God to be true in all things, whether he commaund or forbid, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently receiueh his commaundements, and bewareth of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regarde to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not founde in commaundements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely giuen. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stande in our selues. Therefore if we will not haue our faith to tremble and wauer, we must stay it with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offered vs of the Lorde, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witnesse of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commaundements and also from the promises of the law, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberal embassage, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospel together, when he teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospell was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleueeth: that in it is reuealed the righteousnesse of God from faith to faith. And no maruell. For sith the Gospell is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is no other testimonie sure enough of Gods good will toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, we doe not denie but that the faithfull doe euery way imbrace and receiue the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Euen as the faithfull ought in deede to acknowledge God to be the iudge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regarde vnto his mercifull kindnesse: for as much as he is described to them to be considered such a one as is louing and merciful, farre from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle vnto all, powring foorth his mercie vpon all his workes.

30 Neither yet doe I regarde the barkings of Pighius, or such other dogs, when they finde fault with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith it did take holde but of one peece thereof. I graunt (as I haue already said) that the generall obiect of faith (as they terme it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the world, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatenings to be excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeede true. But the cauillers doe vnjustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the word of God. For our meaning is onely to shew those two things, first, that faith neuer stedfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to be reconciled reconciled to God, but because it completh vs to Christ. Both those points are worthy to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God and the reprobate, betweene the faithfull and the vnbeleeuing. If a man do beleeue that God both iustly commaundeth all that he commaundeth, and truly threatneth, shall he be therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no stedfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercy of God. But now to what end do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inueniencie, if in the definition we do enforce the principall effect thereof, and do ioine vnto the generall name, in stead of a difference that marke that seuereth the faithfull from the vnbeleeuing. Finallie, the malicious haue nothing to find fault withall in this doctrine, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in the same blame, which calleth the Gospell properly the word of faith.

Rom. 10. 8.

31 But heereupon againe we gather that which we haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the word than the fruit doth neede the liuelie roote of the tree, because no other (as Dauid testifieth) can trust in the Lord, but they that knowe his name. But this knowledge is not according to euerie mans imagination, but so farre as God himselfe is witness of his owne goodness. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in an other place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy word. Againe, I haue trusted in thy word, saue me. Where is to be noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the meane time we doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, vnlesse faith susteine it selfe, it can neuer giue vnto God his due honor. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that he beleeued that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I haue beleeued, and I am sure that he is able to keepe that which I haue left with him vntill that day. But if a man wey with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall well perceiue that they which do highlie esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a little profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to do whatsoeuer he will, but when euen the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amazeth vs with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer aboue it those things, that Sathan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esfy, meaning to print into the hearts of the people the assurednes of saluation, doth so honorably intreat of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how maruellously the Lord gouerneth the frame of Heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is heere nothing that serueth not fitly for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to do all things be presently set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the word, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, heere is declared his effectuall power, because godlinesse (as we haue already shewed in an other place) doth alway apply the power of God to vse and worke, specially it setteth before it selfe those workes of God, whereby hee hath testified himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was once the author of saluation, will be an euertlasting preferuer thereof. And Dauid putteth vs in minde by his owne example, that those benefites which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euery man, doe afterward auaile to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to haue forsaken vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his auncient benefites may recomfort vs, as it is said in another Psalm, I haue bene mindfull of olde daies. I haue studied vpon all thy workes, &c. Again, I will remember the workes of the Lorde, and his maruels from the beginning. But because without the worde all quickly vanishest away that we conceiue of the power of God and of his workes, therefore we doe not without cause asirme that there is no faith, vnlesse God giue light vnto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be moued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it seemeth with zeale of faith, passed beyond the bounds of the word. Sara, when she feruently desired the promised issue, gaue her bondmaide to her husband. It cannot bee denied but that shee many waies sinned: but now I touch only this fault, that being carried away with her zeale, she did not restraints her selfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by euill craftie means: shee deceived her husband the witness and minister of the grace of God: shee compelled her sonne to lie: shee by diuers guiles and deceites corrupted the truth of God: Finally, in making a scorne of his promise, shee did as much as in her lay, destroy it. And yet this act, how much fouler it was euill, and woorthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessary that she should ouercom many offences, that she might so earnestly endeour to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and dangers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarch Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the yoonger sonne, yet ceased not to be more fauourably bent to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truly these examples doe teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it be a true faith, hath alway the vpper hand. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make void the effect of the blessing, so neither did it make void her faith which generally raigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that doing. Neuertheless therein Rebecca vttered how ready mans minde is to fall so soone as he giueth himselfe, neuer so little libertie. But though mans default and weakenesse doth darken faith, yet it doth not quench it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, how carefully we ought to hang vpon the mouth of God, and also confirmeth that which we haue raught, that Faith vanishest away, vnlesse it be vpholden by the Worde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Isaac and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wanderings out of the way, vnlesse they had bene by Gods secreete bridle holden in obedience of the worde.

Faith embraceth
no promise but in Christ by whom the thing promised

God. 10. v.
Rom. 1. 17.
2. Cor. 1. 20.

32 Again, not without cause we include all the promises in Christ, for as much as in the knowledge of him the Apottle includeth all the Gospell: and in another place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is ready to be shewed. For if God promise any thing, he therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimonie of his loue. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continuall benefits of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, do thereby wrap themselves in so much the more greuous iudgement. For sith they doe neither thinke nor acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they doe not with themselves consider his goodnesse, therefore they cannot thereby be better taught of his mercie than brut bestes, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receiue the same fruite of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to themselves the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises doe then onely appeere, when they haue found faith with vs, yet the force and naturall propertie of them is neuer extinguished by our vnbeleefe or vnthankfulnesse.

Therefore

Therefore when the Lord by his promises doth prouoke man not onely to receiue, but also to thinke vpon the fruites of his bountifullnes, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Whereupon we must returne to this point, that euery promise is a testifying of Gods loue to a sinner vs. But it is out of question, that no man is loued of God but in Christ, he is the beloued son, in whom the loue of the father abideth and resteth, and then from him powreth it selfe abroad vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that we haue obtained fauor in the beloued one. Therefore it must needs be deriued and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in another place calleth him our peace: in another place he setteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindnes bound vnto vs. It followeth then that we must cast our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs. And that Paul teacheth no absurditie, that all Gods promises whatsoeuer they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There bee certaine examples that make for the contrarie. For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the Prophet the maner how to worship God aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlines is praised. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romane, could scarcely vnderstand that which was knowne not to all the Iewes, yea and that verie darkely: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the sacrifice of Naaman, by the prophets answer allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whom Philip was carried, which if he had not had some faith, would not haue taken vpon him the trauell and expenses of so long a iourney, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, how he betraied his ignorance of the Mediatour. And truly I graunt that their faith was partly vnexpressed, not onely concerning Christs person, but also concerning his power & the office committed vnto him of the father. Yet in the meane time it is certaine, that they were instructed in such principles, as gaue them some taste of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither would the Eunuch haue come in haste to Ierusalem from a farre country to worship an vnknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Iewish religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had bin too fond an absurditie for Elizeus when he taught him of small things, to haue saide nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a darke knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vse themselves in the sacrifices of the law, which must haue been discerned by the very end of them, that is Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare and outward declaration of the word of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it to be beleued, if our owne blindnes and stubbornnes did not withstand it. But our mind hath such an inclination to vanitie, that it can neuer cleaue fast vnto the truth of God, and hath such a dulnes, that it is alway blinde and cannot see the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing appareably done by the word without the enlightning of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is far above mans vnderstanding. Neither that it be sufficient that the mind be lightened with the spirit of God, vnlesse the heart be also strengthened and stablished with his power. Wherein the schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith do onely take holde of a bare and simple assent by knowledge, leauing out the confidence and assurednes of the heart. Therefore faith is both waies a singular gift of God, both that the mind of man is cleansed to taste the truth of God, & that his hart is stablished therein. For the holy Ghost not onely is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees increaseth it, vntil by it he bring vs to the heauenly kingdome. That good thing (saith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But how Paul saith that the holy Ghost is giuen by the hearing of faith, we may easily dissolue it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an absurditie for him to call the holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author and cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherewith God garnisheth his Church, and by encreasing of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no maruell if he ascribe those things to faith which maketh vs fit to receiue them. This is reckened a most strange conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whom it is giuen, can belecue in Christ. But that is partly because they do not consider either how secret and high the heavenly wisdom is, or how great mans vndulnes is in conceiuing the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not vnto that assured and stedfast constanctnes of heart, that is to say, the chiefe part of faith.

34 But if (as Paul preacheth) no man is witness of the will of man, but the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the will of God? And if the truth of God be vncertaine among vs, in those things that we presently behold with our eie, how should it be assured and stedfast among vs there where the Lord promiseth such things as neither eie seeth, nor wit comprehendeth? But herein mans sharpnes of vnderstanding is so ouerblown and faileth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schoole, is to forsake his own wit. For by it as by a veile cast before vs, we are hindered that we cannot attaine the mysteries of God, which are not disclosed but to little ones. For neither doth flesh and blood disclose nor naturall man perceiue those things that are of the spirit, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be iudged. Therefore herein the helpe of the holy Ghost is necessarie, or rather herein his force onely raigneth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath bene his counsellor: but the holy spirit searcheth out all things, euen the deepe secretes of God, by whom it is brought to passe, that we know the minde of Christ. No man (saith he) can come to me: vnlesse my father that sent me, draw him. Euery one therefore that hath heard and learned of my father, cometh. Not that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Euen as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but being drawn by the spirit of God: so when we be drawn, we are lifted vp in wit and minde aboue our vnderstanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a new sharpnes of vnderstanding, wherewith it may beholde heauenly mysteries, with brightnesse wherof it was before dazeled in it selfe. And so mans vnderstanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doth neuer till then truly begin to taste of those things that belong to the kingdome of God, being before altogether vnsworie and without iudgement of taste to take assay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set out vnto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing preuailed, vnill he opened their senses that they might vnderstand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirit of Truth must bee sent vnto them, to powre into their wundes the same doctrine which they had heard with their eares. The worde of GOD is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profite among blinde men. But we are all in this behalfe blind by nature, therefore it cannot pearce into our mind but by the inwarde master the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entrie for it.

35 In another place, when we had to entreate of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnfit men are to beleue. Therefore I will not wearie the readers with repeating the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spirit of faith is called of Paul faith it selfe, which the spirit giueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therefore he praieth that God fulfil in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans owne motion: and not contented therewith therewith he addeth further, that it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdom of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh indeed of outward myracles: but because the reprobate are blinde at the beholding of them, hee comprehendeth also that inward seale, whereof he maketh mention in another place. And God, the more gloriously to set foorth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchsafeth not to graunt it to all vniuersally without difference, but by singular priuledge giueth it to whom he wil. For prooffe wherof we haue alleaged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expositour, crieth out that it would please the Sauour to teach him, and that the very beleeuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deseruing. No man (saith he) commeth to me, vnlesse my father draw him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two do heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it to himselfe: let him that ascendeth, not arrogantly asigne it to himselfe. In another place. Why is it giuen to one and not to another? It grieueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wote not what depth of the iudgements of God which wee may not search proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, & not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may crie out with wondering, but not them in diputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when he enlighteneth vs vnto faith by the power of his spirit, doth therewithal graffe vs into his body, that we may be made partakers of all good things.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may bee further conueied into the hart. For the word of God is not throughly receiued by faith, if it swimme in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken roote in the bottoome of the hart that it may be an inuincible defence to beare and repulse all the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true vnderstanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the hart, his power much more euidently appeereth, euen by so much as the distuitfulness of the hart is greater than the blindness of the wit: and as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assurednesse, than the wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seale, to seale vp in our harts those same promises, the assurance wherof it first imprinted in our wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirme and stablish them. Sith yee beleued (saith the Apostle) yee are sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the Spirit the harts of the faithfull are grauen as with seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratifieth the Gospell vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he saith: God which annointed vs, which hath also sealed vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our hart. And in another place when he speaketh of confidence and boldnesse of hoping well, hee maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I saide before, the remembraunce wherof experience continually renueth, that is, that faith is tossed with diuerse doubtings, so that the mindes of the godly are seldome quiet, or at least do not alway enjoy a peaceable state: but with whatsoever engine they be shaken, either they rise vp of the very gulfe of temptations, or do abide fast in their standing. Truly this assurednesse onely nourisheth & defendeth faith, when we hold fast that which is saide in the Psalm. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore wee will not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leape into the haire of the Sea. Also this most sweete quietnesse is spoken of in another place: I laie downe and slept, and rose againe, because the Lord hath sustained me: it is not meant thereby that Dauid was alway with one vndisturbed course framed to a merry cheer-

We haue not faith as foons as the truth is conueied in our mindes, except the spirit seale it also in our harts.

fulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God according to his proportion of Faith, therefore he glorieyth that he without feare despiseth all that euer might disturb the peace of his minde. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to Faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Esay it is said: In hope and silence shall be your strength. In the Psalme: Hold thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrues: Patience is needfull, &c.

*The certaintie of grace which we haue by Faith is more then morall
or coniecturall,*

38 Hereby we may iudge how pcellent is that doctrine of the Schoolemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall coniecture as eury man thinketh himselfe worthy of it. Truly if we shall weigh by our workes how God is minded toward vs, I graunt that we can attaine it with any coniecture, be it neuer so slender: but sith Faith ought to haue relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall we be armed, if we say that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, so that the purenes of our life do deserue it? But because I haue appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrary to Faith, than either coniecture or any thing neere vnto doubting. And they doe very ill writhe to this purpose that testimony of the Preacher which they haue oft in their mouthes: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or loue. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the commo translation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such words: that is, that if any man will iudge by the present state of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboureth in vaine, and troubleth himselfe to no profit for his pames: sith all things happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witnes his loue to them to whom he maketh all things happen prosperously, nor doth alwayes viter the hatred to them whom he punisheth. And that he doth to condemn the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in things most needefull to be knownen: as he had written a litle before, that it cannot be discerned what the soule of man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to die in like manner. If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we hold of the immortalitie of soules standeth vpon coniecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits which gather that there is no certaintie of Gods grace, because we can conceiue none by the carnall beholding of present things?

*It is no presumption to know the loue of God towards vs and his spirite which is

1. Cor. 2. 12.*

39 But they alleadge that it is a point of rash presumption, to take vpon vs an vndoubted knowledge of Gods will. I would indeede graunt it vnto them, if we did take so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secreet purpose of God subiect to the slenderesse of our witte: But when we simply say with Paul, that we haue receiued not the spirite of this world, but the spirite that is of God, by whose teaching we may know those things that are giuen vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderously speake against the Spirite of God? But if it be a horrible robbie of God to accuse the reuelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassured or vndoubtfull, what doe we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they say, that this also is not without great presumptuousnesse that we dare so glory of the Spirite of Christ. Who would thinke that their dulnesse were so great that would be connted matters of the world, that they so fowllie stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, viles their own writings that are abroad did refuse it. Paul pronounceth that they only are the children of God, that are mouued with his spirite: and these men would haue them that be the children of God, to be mouued with their owne spirit, and to be without the Spirite of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy Ghost ministrerth that word vnto vs, which onely can beare witnessse to our Spirite that we are the children of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vpon God, yet doe take away his Spirit, by whose guiding he should haue bene righte called vpon. Paul denieth that they are the seruants of Christ, that are not moued with the Spirit of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirit of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnlesse we feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without any such feeling. But peradventure they will answer, that they doe not deny that we ought to bee endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie and humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the Faith, to prooue themselves whether they haue Christ, whom vnlesse a man doe acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath giuen vs (saith Iohn) we know that he abideth in vs. And what doe we else but call the promises of Christ in doubt, when we will be counted the seruants of God without his Spirit, which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out vpon all his? Beside that, we doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him Faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindness, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glory of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truly Christ said, that his Spirit is vnknown to the world, and is onely known of them with whom he abideth.

Rom 8. 14.

40 And because they will not goe about to ouerthrow the stedfastnesse of Faith with digging onely of one mine, they assaile it also otherwise. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousness, we may gather a iudgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseverance to the ende abideth in suspense. A goodly confidence of saluation forsooth is left vnto vs, if we iudge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment we be in fauour, and what shall become of vs to morow we cannot tell. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise: I am surelie persuaded (saith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue wherewith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, prating that the Apostle had that by speciall reuelation. But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things that commonly come by Faith to the Faithfull, not those that he himselfe specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weakenes and vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby we should be ouerthrowen, but whereby we may learne to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednes of faith to a moment of time, whose proprietie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Sith therefore the Faithfull doe impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his Spirit they doe by Faith enioy the beholding of the heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnesse, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulnes, in vnkindly luding Gods goodnes, than he doth declare his modestie or submission.

41 Because it seemed that the nature of Faith could nor otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substance of the promise vpon which it resteth as vpon his proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, Faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheth away: therefore we rooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he saith that Faith is a substance of things to be hoped for, and a certaintie of things that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he vseth) he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, whereupon the godly mind leaueh and resteth. As if he should say that faith is a certaine and assured possession of those things that are promised vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for assurance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow thit which is more commonlie receiued. Again, to signifie that euen to the last day when the bookes shalbe opened, they are higher than those things that may be perceived with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handled with our hands, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by vs, but if we goe beyond the capacity of our owne wit, and bend our vnderstanding about all things that are in the world, yea and climbe about our selues, he hath therefore added that this assurednes of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plain appearance (as Paul writeth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaintie or prooffe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a conjunction of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he saith as much as if he did say, that it is an euident shewing of things not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of darke things: a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they be that pertaine to our saluation, cannot be seene in themselves and in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whose truth we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done and fulfilled. But how can the mind lift vp it selfe to receiue such a taste of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholly kindled to loue God againe? For that flowing plentie of sweetnes which God hath laid vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truly known, but that it must therewithall vehemently moue affection: and whose affection it once moueth, it vterely ranshet and carrieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no maner, if into a peruerse and crooked heart neuer entereth this affection, by which being conueied vp into the verie heauen, we are suffered to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of God, and the most sacred priuy places of his kingdome, which may not be desiled with the entrance of an vncleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnesse. For it is faith only that first engendredh charitie in vs. How much more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleuee (saith he) that the testimonie of conscience, which Paul calleth the glorie of the godlie, consisteth in three things. For first of all it is necessarie to beleuee that thou canst not haue forgiveness of sins, but by the pardon of God: then that thou canst haue no good worke at all, vnlesse he also giue it: last of all that thou canst by no works deserue eternall life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A little after he addeth that these things suffice not, but that there is a certaine beginning of faith, because in beleueing that sins cannot be forgiven but of God, we ought also to beleuee that they are not forgiven vs, till also we be perswaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, that saluation is laid vp in store for vs: because God forgiveth finnes, he himselfe giueth merites, and he himselfe also giueth rewards, that we may not sit ty still in this beginning. But these and other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

Now where soeuer this heely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternall saluation, as an vndiuidable companion: or rather that it engendredh or bringeth it forth out of it selfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriously soeuer we talke of faith, yet we are conuicted to haue no faith at all. For if faith (as is aboue said) be an assured perswasion of Gods truth, that it cannot be vnto vs nor decline vs, nor become void, then they that haue conceiued this assurednesse, trulie doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their perswasion cannot be but true: so that briefly, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath beleueed to be truly promised of God. So faith beleueeth that God is true, hope looketh for the performance performance of his truth in conuenient time. Faith beleueth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shew himselfe such a one toward vs. Faith beleueth that eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reueiled. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nourisheth and sustaineth faith. For as no man can looke for anie thing at Gods hand, but he that hath first belieued his promises: so againe the weakenesse of our faith must with patient hope and expectation be sustained and cherished, that it fall not as fainting for wearinesse. For which reason Paul doeth well place our saluation in hope. For hope, while it in silence, looketh for the Lord, restraineth faith that it fall not headlong with too much haste: hope strengtheneth faith, that it wauer not in Gods promises, nor begin to doubt of the truth of them: hope refresheth faith that it waxe not wearie: Hope stretcheth faith to the vtermost bound, that it faint not in the mid course, nor in the verie beginning. Finally, hope by continually renewing and restoring, it maketh it now and then to rise vp fresher than it selfe to continuance. But how many waies the helps of hope are necessarie to the strengthening of faith, shall better appeare, if we consider with how manie sorts of temptations they are assailed and shaken, that haue embraced the word of God. First, the Lord in deferring his promises doeth oftentimes holde our mindes longer in suspence than we would wish: here it is the office of hope to performe, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises do tarie, yet we should wait still for them. Sometime he suffereth vs not onely to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeased: here it is much more necessarie to haue hope to help vs, that according to the saying of another Prophet, we may still looke for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There rise vp all scorners (as Peter saith) that aske: where is his promise of his comming? for as much as since the fathers slept, all things to continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the flesh and the world do whisper the same thing in our eares. Heere must faith stayed with sufferance of hope be holden fast fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thousand yeres like as one day.

Psal. 90. 4.

43 For this conioyning and alliance the Scripture sometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preferred through faith, vnto the disclosing of saluation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fully agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we haue already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment and strength of faith. Sometimes they are ioyned together: as in the same Epistle. That your faith and hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith deriueth expectation, because in patiently hoping, we hold our desires in suspence, till Gods conuenient oportunitie be opened. All which matter we may better vnderstand by the 10. chapter to the Hebrewes, which I haue already alleadged. Paul in an other place, although he speake vnproperly, yet meaneth the same things in these words: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousnes, eue because we embracing the testimonie of the Gospell concerning his free loue, do looke for the time when God shall openlie shew that which is now hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard laith two foundatōs of hope that is the grace of God, and the deseruing of works. Hope can haue no other make to be directed vnto, but faith: and we haue already declared that faith hath one only make the merite of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a luty reason he bringeth. If (saith he) thou darst hope for any thing without deseruings, that shall not be worthe to be called hope, but presumptiō. Who (gentle reader) will not worthily abhorre such beasts, that say, it is arath and presumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his word? For where the Lorde wiltech vs to looke for all things at his goodnesse, they saye it is presumption to leane and rest vpon it. A maister meete for such schollers as he found in the

Mat. 9. 27.

The iij. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

One of faith repentance spring-geth.

ALbeit we haue already partly taught how faith possesseth Christ, & how by it we enioy his benefits: neuertheless this were yet darke, vntill we did also make declaration of the effects that we feele thereby. Not without caue it is said, that the summe of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiveness of finnes. Therefore leauing out these two points, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shall be but a hungrie and vnperfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and we obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shall be to Repentance, because when this article is well perceiued, it shall the better appeare how man is iustified by onely faith and meere pardon, and yet how reall holines of life (as I may so call it) is not seuered from free imputation of righteousness. Now it ought to be out of question, that repentance doth not onely immediately follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon and forgiveness is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being deliuered from the tyrannie of Satan, from the yoke of sin, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdome of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but he must returne from the errors of his former life into the right way, and apply all his studie to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruit out of a tree, they neuer knew the force thereof, and are moued with too weake an argument to thinke so.

*Their grounds
weake who thinke that repentance goeth before faith.
Matth. 3. 2.
Matth. 3. 7.
Act. 10. 21.*

2 Christ (say they) and Iohn in their preachings do first exhort the people to repentance, and then they afterward saie that the kingdome of heauen is at hande. Such commaundement to preach, the Apostles receiued, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the ioyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the words hang together. For when the Lord Christ and Iohn do preach in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand: do they not fetch the cause of repentance from verie grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their words are as much in effect as if they had saide: because the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hande, therefore repent yee. For Matthew when he hath shewed that Iohn so preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophetic of Esaie, concerning the voice crying in the wilderness. Prepare the way of the Lorde, make straight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort & glad tydings. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dreame a certaine vaine space of time, wherein it bringeth it out, but we meane to shew that a man cannot earnestly apply himselfe to repentance, vntill he know himselfe to be of God. But no man is truly perswaded that he is of God, but he that hath first receiued his grace. But these things shall be more plainly discussed in the proesse following. Peradventure this deceiued them, that many are first by terrours of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they haue throughly digested, yea before they haue tasted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which some some account among vertues, because they see that it is neere to true and iust obedience. But our question is not heere how diuersly Christ draweth vs vnto him, or prepareth vs to the endeour of godlinesse: onely thus I say, that there can be no vprightnes found where reigneth not the Spirit which Christ receiued to communicate the same to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalme: With thee is mercifulnes, that thou maiest be feared, no man shal euer cuerently fear god, but he that trusteth that God is mercifull vnto him: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the lawe, but hee that is perswaded that his seruices please him: which tendernes in pardoning and bearing with faults, is a signe of fatherly fauour. Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, because he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs: he hath stricken vs, and he will cure vs, because the hope of pardon is vsed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their finnes. But their doting errour is without all colour of reason, which to begin at repentance do appoint certaine daies to their newe conuerces, during the which they must exercise themselves in penance: and when those daies are once past, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospell. I speake of many of the Anabaptistes, specially those that maruellously reioice to be counted spirituall, and their companions the Iesuites, & such other dregs. Such fruits forsooth that spirite of giddines bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compasse of a fewe daies, which a Christian man ought to extende in continuance throughout his whole life.

3 But certaine learned men, euen long before these times, meaning to speake simply and sincerely of repentance, according to the truth of Scripture, haue saide that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and viuification. Mortification they expound to be a sorrowe of the soule and feare conceiued of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the iudgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then he truly beginneth to hate and abhorre sinne: then hee hartilie misliketh himselfe, confesseth himselfe to bee miserable and lost, and witheth himselfe to bee an other man. Further, when hee is touched with some feeling of the iudgement of God (for the one immediately followeth vpon the other) then he lieth stricken and ouerthrowen, then he trembleth, humbled and cast downe, then he is discouraged and despaireth. This is the first part of repentance, which they haue commonly called contrition. Viuification they expound to bee the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man ouerthrowne with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterward vnto the goodnes of God, vnto the mercy, fauor and saluation, that is through Christ, raiseth vp himselfe, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And these words, if they haue a right exposition, do aptly enough expresse the nature of repentance. But where they take Viuification for the cheerefulness, which the minde receiue being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: forasmuch as it rather signifieth a desire to liue holily and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were saide, that man dicth to himselfe, to begin to liue to God.

4 Some other, because they saue this worde diuersly taken in Scripture, haue made two sortes of repentance: and because they shoulde make them differentlie known by some marke, they haue called one repentance of the lawe, by which the sinner wounded with the searing iron of sinne, and worne away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble and cannot winde himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospell, by which the sinner is indeed greiuously vexed with himselfe, but he riseth vp higher and taketh hold of Christ, the salue of his soule, the comfort of his feare, the haugen of his miserie. Of the Repentance of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whose repentance when the Scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greiuous-

Repentance rightly said to consist of two parts, Mortification and Viuification: so that Viuification be taken not for the cheerefulness which the soul receiueth when it recouereth out of feare and trouble, but for the purpose and desire which it hath to lead a new life.

Two kinds of repentance, the one of the Lawe, the other of the Gospell nesse of their sinne, were afraid of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onely as a reuenger and Iudge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entrie of hell, wherinto they being entred into this present life, began already to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maiestie. The repentance of the Gospell, we see in all them, that being galled with the spurre of sinne in themselves, but recomforted and rufished with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lord. Exechias was stricken with feare, when he receiued the message of death: but he praised weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, he tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Ninuites were troubled with the horrible threatening of destruction. But they clothed themselves in sackcloth and ashes and prayed, hoping that the Lord might be turned to them and turned from the furor of his wrath. Dauid confessed that he had too much sinned in numbing the people: but he said further, Lord take away the wickednes of thy seruant. He acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, and did cast himselfe downe before the Lord, but therewithall he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their hart, but trusting vpon the goodnesse of God, they said furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we doe? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeed bitterly, but he ceased not to hope well.

5 Although all these things be true, yet the very name of repentance (so far as I can learne by the Scriptures) is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend Faith vnder repentance, it disagreeeth with that which Paul saith in the Actes, that he testified to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and Faith in Iesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance and Faith as two diuers things. What then? Can true repentance stand without Faith? No: But though they cannot be seuered, yet they must be distinguished. As Faith is not without hope, and yet Faith and Hope are diuers things: so repentance and Faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bonde, yet they rather would be conioyned than confounded. And truly I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof Faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easily appeare when the force and nature thereof shall be declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is deuied of conuerting or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing it selfe doth not ill agree with either deuinations, whereof the summe is, that we departing from our selues should turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, should put on a new. Wherefore in my iudgement, repentance may thus not amisse be defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the old man, and in the quickening of the Spirit. In this sense are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophets in old time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onely thing they traueled to perswade, that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lords iudgement, they should fall downe and be humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendment returne into his right way. Therefore these words, To be turned or returne vnto the Lord, To repent, or doe penance, are among them vsed without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy history saith, that men repent after the Lord, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe begin to follow his word, and are readie at their captaines commandement to goe whither hee calleth them. And Iohn and Paul vsed these wordes, to bring forth fruites worthy of repentance, for, to lead such a life as may represent and testifie such an amendment in all their doings.

6 But before we goe any further, It shall be profitable that we do more plainly set out at large the definition that we haue made. Wherein there bee chiefly three points to be considered. First when wee call it a turning of life vnto God, we require a transforming, not onely in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put off her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring forth the fruits of workes agreeable to her renewing. Which when the prophet gooth about to expresse, he commaundeth them whom he callith to repentance, to make them a new heart. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew how the Israclites might repent, and so be rightly turned vnto the Lord, teacheth that it be done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which manner of speaking we see often repeated of the Prophets) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceiue what is the naturall proprietie of repentance than the fourth Chapter of Ieremie. If thou returne to me, O Israell, (saith the Lord) returne to me, plow vp your arable land and sowe not vpon thorns. Be circuncised to the Lord, and take away the vncircumcised skins of your hearts. See how he prououcedh that they shall nothing preuaile in taking vpon them the following of righteousness, vnles wickednes be first plucked out of the bottom of their hearts. And to moue them througely, he warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dallying, because he hateth a double hart. I therefore Esai laugheth to scorne the foolish endeouours of hypocrites, which did in deede busily go about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane tyme they had no care to looke the bundles of wickednes wherewith they held poore men fast tied. Where also he very well sheweth in what duties vnfaigned repentance properly standeth.

7 The second point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the mind of a sinner be inclined to repentance, it must be stirred vp with thinking vpon the iudgement of God. But when this thought is once througely settled, that God will one day go vp into his iudgement seate, to require an account of all thyngs and doings: it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of tyme, but continually stirreth him vp to thinke vpon a new trade of life, whereby he may safely appeare at that iudgement. I therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance maketh mention of the iudgement: as in Ieremie least peraduenture my wrath go out as fire, and there be none to quench it, because of the nauyhtines of your workes. In Pauls sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with the times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euery where may repent them, because he hath appointed the day wherein he will iudge the world in equitie. And in many other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a iudge, that sinners should thinke with themselues, that worse things hang ouer them if they do not repent in tyme. You haue an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring and hatred of sin, therefore the Apostle maketh forrowfulness, such as is according to God, the cause of repentance. And he calleth forrowfulness according to God, when we are not onely afraid of punishment, but do here and abhor sin it selfe, foras much as we vnderstand that it displeaseth God. And no manuell. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, the slothfulness of our flesh could not be corrected, yet prickings would not suffice for the dulnes and slothfulness thereof, vnles God in stretching out his rods should peare more deeply. This is also an obstinacie which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the penitensines of our nature enforceeth god to the severity that he vseth in threatening, because he should in vaine call vs assuringly with faire speech while we lie a sleep. I recite not the testimonies that commonly offer themselves to be found. The feare of God is in another manner also the beginning of repentance.

The turning of our liues vnto God doth note an alteration not onely of our outward actions, but also and that especially of our soules.

Cap. 3. Of the maner how to receiue

For though mans life were absolutely furnished with all points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may indeed be praised of the world, but in heauen it shall be meere abomination, forasmuch as the chiefe part of our righteousnes is to giue God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our selues to yeeld vs subiect to his government.

Repentance consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and the quickening of the spirit.
Psal. 34. 15.
Esay 1. 16.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is ment by this that we saie, that Repentance consisteth in two parts, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickening of the spirite. The Prophets do plainly expresse it, although somewhat simplic and grossly according to the capacite of the carnall people, when they say: Cease from euill and do goodnes. Againe: Be washed, be cleane, take away the euil of your works from mine eyes: Cease to do pueritly, learne to do well, seeke iudgement, help the oppressed, &c. For when they call men away from wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednes and puerfenesse. It is in deed an vneasie and hard thing to put off our selues, and to depart from our natural disposition. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is thoroughly dead, vnlesse all that wee haue of our selues be abolished. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enemie against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expresse the reuening by the fruits that followe thereof, as righteousnesse, iudgement, and mercy. For it were not enough to doe those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the hart haue first put on the affection of righteousnesse, iudgement, and mercie. That is done when the spirite of God hath sooked in newe thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holinesse, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truly as we are naturally turned away from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our selues doe go before, we can neuer go toward that which is right. Therefore wee are so oft commanded to put off the old man, to forsake the worlde and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, and to be renewed in the spirite of our minde. Morouer the very name of morification doth put vs in minde how hard it is to forget our former nature: because wee thereby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the feare of God, nor doe learne the principles of godlines, but when we are violently flaine with the word of the spirit, and so brought to naught euen as though God should pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

Rom. 8. 4.

True repentance is nothing else but regeneration wher by Christ restoreth vs vnto the righteousness of God from whence by sin we were fallen.

Rom. 6. 6.
2. Cor. 3. 18.
Eph 4. 23.

9 Both these things do happen vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we doe truly communicate of his death, by the power therof our old man is crucified, & the body of sin dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may liue no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection by it we are raised vp into a newenes of life, that may agree with the righteousness of God. In one word I expound repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence fowly defaced & in a maner vterly blotted out, may be renewed in vs. So the Apostle teacheth when he saith: but wee representing the glorie of God with vncouered face are transformed into the same image, out of glorie into glorie, as by the spirit of the Lord. Againe: Be yee renewed in the spirite of your minde and put on the new man, which is created according to God in righteousness and holinesse of truth. Againe in another place: putting on the newe man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration we be by the benefite of Christ restored into the righteousness of God, fro which we were fallen by Adam. After which maner it pleaseth the Lord wholly to restore al those whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yeare, but by continuall, yea and sometimes slowe proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, clenseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renning all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselues all their their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthie railer and apostata Staphilus, which foolishly sayeth that I confound the state of this present life with the heauenlie glorie, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holinesse and true righteoussesse. As though when anie thing is defined, we should not seeke the whole fullnesse and perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increase: but I say that how neere any man approacheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run all their life long.

2. Cor. 4. 1.

10 The children of God therefore are so deliuered by regeneration from the bondage of sin, not that hauing now obtained the full possession of libertie, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should haue remaining a continuall matter of strife, wherewith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learne their owne weakenes. And in this point all writers of sound iudgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of euill, from whence continually spring desires that allure and stir him to sin. They confesse also that the holy ones are still to holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot withstand but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to couetousnesse, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needfull to labour much in searching what the old writers haue thought herein, forasmuch as onlie Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfullie and with great diligence gathered all their iudgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certaintie as they shall desire to learne of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to be this difference betwene him and vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lusts, that they cannot but lust, yet dareth not call that disease sin, but being content to expresse it by the name of weaknes, he teacheth that then only it becommeth sin, when either worke or consent is added to conceit or receiuing, th it is, when will yeeldeth to the first desire: but we account the very same for sin, that man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, yea we affirme that the very corruption that ingendreth such desires in vs, is sin. We teach therefore that there is alwaie sin in the holie ones vntill they be vnclouted of the mortall bodie, because there remaineth in their flesh the peeuishnesse of lusting that fighteth against vprightnes. And yet he doth not alway forbear to vse the name of sinne, as when he saith: This Paul calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all finnes vnto a fleshly concupiscesse. This asmuch as pertaineth to the holy ones, looteth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which words he confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sinne, inasmuch as they are subiect to the lustes of the flesh.

In the regenerate there remaineth still concupiscesse, which concupiscesse is sinne and not weakenes onely as S. Augustine saith in his sermons.

Lib. ad Bonif. 4. Li. 1. & 2. contra Iulianum.

Ser. 6. de verbis Apost.

11 But this that is saide, that God purgeth his Church from all sinne, that he promiseth that grace of deliuerance by baptisme, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we refferre rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the very matter of sinne. God truly performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the vpper hand and are conquerours in the battell) but it ceaseth onely to reigne and not so to dwell in them. Therefore we so say, that the olde man is crucified, and the lawe of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leanings, not to haue dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenes. And wee confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but we affirme that this cometh to passe by the mercie of God, that the holie ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should iustlie be reckoned sinners and guiltie before God. And this sentence it shall not be hard for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are euident testimonies of the Scripture vpon their their matter. For what would we haue more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romanes Chapter 7? First both we haue in an other place shewed, and Augustine proueth by strong reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that he vseth these wordes Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not caull against those wordes, but who can deny, that a struing against the Law of GOD is euill, who can deny a withstanding of Iustice to be sinne? Finally, who will not graunt that there is a fault where is a spirituall misery? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, we haue an assured demonstration by the Law, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For we are commanded to loue God with all our harts, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our Soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the Commandement that conceiue in their hart any desire be it neuer so little, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie? For what are not these the powers of the Soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these doe open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euen so much voided of the loue of God? Wherefore, who so confesseth not that all the lusts of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, he must needs denie that the transgression of the Law is sinne.

Our naturall desires are corrupte not in that they are naturall but in that they are inordinate.

12 If any man thinke it an absurditie, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally moued in affection, are vniuersally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the Author of nature. We answere, that we doe not condemne those desires that God hath so engrauen into the minde of man at the first Creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the very nature of man, but onely outrageous and vnbrided motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now sith by reason of the peruersenes of nature all hir powers are infected and corrupted, that in all hir dooings appeareth a continuall disorder and intemperance, because the desires cannot be feuered from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in fewer words) we teach that all the desires of men are euill: and we accuse them to be guiltie of sin, not in that that they are naturall, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt and vncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometime forbearth to vse the name of sinne. Yet where he writeth that the Law of sinne still remaining in the holy ones, the onely guiltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

Ad Rom. 7.

Concupiscence acknowledged by S. Augustine and S. Ambrose to be sinne: wherunto S. Iames is not repugnant when he saith that concupiscence after it hath conceued doth bring forth sinne.

13 We will alleadge some other sentences, whereby shall better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Julian: This Law of sinne is both releas'd by the spirituall regeneration, and abideth in the mortall flesh, releas'd herein, because the guiltines is taken away in the Sacrament whereby the faithfull are regenerate: and it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sin (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is releas'd in baptism, but not ended. Againe, The law of sinne (of which yet remaining the guiltines is in baptism discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flesh to lust against the spirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in respect of the guiltines wherin it held vs, & euen being dead, it still rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of buriall. And yet plainer in the fifth booke. As the blindness of hart is both a sinne, whereby man beleeueth not in God: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud hart is chastised with woorthy correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart: so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sin, because there is in it disobedience against the government of the minde: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is giuen for recompence to the deseruings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he consenteth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Heere without any doubtfull speech he calleth it sinne, because when error was once ouerthrowen, and the truth confirmed, he lesse feared slanderous reports. As in the 41. Homily vpon John, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his mind, he saith: If in the flesh thou serue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselfe saith: let not sinne reigne in your mortall bodie to obey the desires thereof. He saith not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needs be in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defend that lust is no sinne, are woont to object that saying of Iames: Lust, after that it hath conceived, bringeth fourth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnlesse we thinke that he speaketh of onely ill workes or actuall sinnes, euill will it selfe, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischieuous deeds and wicked offences the offspringes of sin, and giueth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euil thing and damnable before God.

Rom. 6. 12.

Iames 2.

14 Certaine Anabaptists in this age, deuise I wote not what phrantike intemperance in steede of spirituall regeneration: saying that the children of God restored into the state of innocency, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they neuer goe out of the waie. It were incredible that mans minde could fall to so great madness, vnlesse they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truly it is monstrous. But it is meete that such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnes, thit so hie perswaded their mind to turne the truth of God into a lie. Shall all the choise of honeste and dishoneste, right and wrong, good and euill, vertue and vice, be taken away? Such difference (say they) commeth of the custidines of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So now there shall be no difference betwene fornication and chastitee, plaine dealing and subtletie, truth and lying, iustice and extortion. Take away vaine feare, say they, the Spirit will command thee no euill thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yeeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lusts, haue put off all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spirit do they belch out? For we reknowledge one Christ, and his only Spirit whome the Prophets haue commended, whome the Gospell giuen vs dooth preach, of whom we there heare no such thing. That Spirit is no patron of manslaughter, whoredome, drunkennes, pride, contention, couetousnesse, and guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobriete, modestie, peace, temperance and truth. It is not a giddie spirit, and runneth headlong without consideration through right and wrong, but is full of wisdom, & vnderstanding, that discerneth rightly betwene iust & vniust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute and vnbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betwene lawfull and vnlawfull, and teacheth to keepe measure & temperance: but why do we labour any longer in consulting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublefom phantasmie, which either the diuels haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue reueied being forged of other: but they reuerentlie seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things be taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that he might bring vs into the obedience of Gods will being purged frō vncleannesse and defilings, which obedience can not stand, vnlesse lusts be tamed & subdued, wherunto these men would giue the bridle

The phreneticke imagination of Anabaptists teaching that men regenerate should take no care to bridle any disorderred desire in themselves, but onely follow the conduct of the spirit which can not lead them into any euill: so that whatsoeuer they do in this their state of imagined innocencie it is spirituall & good.

at libertie. Secondly we are taught that we are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are still besieged with many vices and much weaknesse, so long as we are inclosed in the burden of our body : whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, we haue neede alway to increase somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we haue neede daily to wrastle with them. Wherupon also followeth, that shaking of sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedfull mindes, that we be not compassed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peraduenture we thinke that we haue proceeded further than the Apostle, which yet was wearied of the Angell of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weaknesse : and which did vnfaignedly represent in his flesh that diuision of the flesh, and of the spirit.

2. Cor. 12. 15.
Rom 7 6.

1. Cor. 7. 11.
Seauen either effects, causes or properties of repentance reckoned up by the Apostle.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth seuen either causes or effectes or partes thereof, he doth that of a very good cause : and these they be : endeuour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurditie, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effectes. For both may be defended in dispute. They may bee also called affections ioyned with repentance : but because, leauing out those questions, we may vnderstand what Paul meaneth, we shall be content with a simple declaration of them. He saith therefore, that of the heavinesse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithall stirred vp to diligence and heedfulnesse, to winde himselfe cleerely out of the snares of the diuel, to take better heede of his snares, to fall no more from the gouernance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the iudgement of God, either doth denie that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnesse of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in crauing of pardon, than in defence of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confesse their faultes, doe yet vse intreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all means that they can, that they haue not cast away the reuerence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they go not about to prooue themselves righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation thereby the sinner fretteth inwardly with himselfe, quarrelleth with himselfe, is angry with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne peruerfnesse and his owne vnthankfulnesse to God. By the name of feare, he meaneth that trembling that is stricken into our mindes so oft as we thinke both what we haue deserved, and how horrible is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For wee must needs .hen be vexed with a maruellous vnquietnesse, which both instructeth vs to humilitie, and maketh vs, more ware against the time to come. Now if out of feare doe spring that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then we see with what linc-king they hang together. It seemeth to me that he hath vsed this worde Desire for diligence in our dutie and readie cheerefulnesse to obey, wherunto the acknowledging of our owne faultes ought cheefely to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he ioyneth immediately next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearfulness, wherewith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughts : what haue I done ? whither had I throwne my selfe headlong, if the mercie of God did not helpe me ? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigoros that we be to our selues, and the straightlier that we examine our owne sinnes, so much the more we ought to trust that God is fauourable and mercifull vnto vs. And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being stricken with horror of the iudgement of God must needs doe some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truly the godly do feele what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselves, and other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes. But let vs remember that there is measure to be kept, that sorrow do not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to feareful consciences than falling to despair. And also by that craftie meane whomsoever Satan findeth ouertrowen with dread of God, hee more and more drowneth them in the gulfes of sorrow, that they may neuer rise vp againe. Truly the fear cannot be too great which endeth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he moue himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, hee dissi- aire not, oppressed with too great feare, for so do we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Vpon which point this lesson of Leonard is very profitable: Sorrow for sins is necessarie, if it be not continual. I counsell you sometime to returne your fault from grieuous and painfull remembrance of your own waies, and to climbe vp to the plaine ground of chearfull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle honie with wormwood, that the wholsome bitternes may bring vs health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetnes. And if ye thinke of your flues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lord in goodnes.

Heb. 11. 3.

Sermone 11. in Cant.

16 Now it may be also perceiued what be the fruits of repentance, euen the duties of godlines toward God, and of charitie toward men, and therewithall a holines and purenes in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to ali the commandements of the lawe, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vncleannesse in the verie fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies that do set out true repentance, of which thing I will hereafter set before the readers eyes a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scoorne at their follies that goe about to appease God with ceremonies, and do they that they be meere mockeries, and partly do teach that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart: whosoever is euen meanely exercised in the Scripture, shall perceiue of himselfe without any other mans putting in minde, that when we haue to do with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inwarde affection of the heart. And the place of Isaell shall not a litle helpe to the vnderstanding of the rest, where he saith: Teare your heart and not your garments. Also both those points are expressed in these wordes of Iames: Yee wicked doers, cleanse your hands: yee double men, purge your hearts. Where indeede there is an addition ioyned to the first part, but after is shewed the verie fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthines, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises, which we vse priuately as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, and publickely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceede from that punishment of our Pauil speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to be in loathsome-nes, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse and all trimming, and to forsake all delights. Then hee that feelth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreover he that well bethinketh him how grieuous a thing it is to haue offended the iustice of God, cannot rest vntill he haue in his owne humilitie giuen glorie vnto God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance. But albeit they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shall pardon me, if I speake what I thinke: it seemeth vnto mee that they stande too much vpon them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I trust he will agree with me, that they haue two waies gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, and with immeasurable commendation advanced that bodily discipline, this indeed they obtained,

The fruits of repentance, purging of the heart, outward amendment of life and manners. Besides which there are also certaine externall exercises serving to humble or to declare that we are humbled, wherein the old writers haue two waies gone beyond measure.

that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a maner darkened that, which ought to haue been of much greater importance. Secondly, in giuing punishments they were somewhat more rigorous then ecclesiasticall mildnes may beare, as we shall haue occasion to shew in another place.

The use of weeping, fasting, sorrow, sackcloth and such like outward things in matters of repentance.
Ioch. 2. 12.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting and ashes spoken of, both often in other places and specially in Ioch, they measure the chiefe part of repentance by fasting and weeping: therefore their error is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance: but weeping and fasting are not ioyned as continuall or necessarie effects thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a speciall circumstance. Because he had prophesied, that there hanged ouer the Iewes a most grieuous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to preuent the wrath of God, not onely in repenting, but also in vttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arraigned, vteth humbly to abase himselfe with an ouer-grown beard, vncombed haire and blacke apparell, to moue the iudge to pitie: so it behooued them when they stood accused before the iudgement seat of God in piteous aray to beseech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peraduenture more fitly agree with those times: yet it is certaine, that weeping and fasting should be to a very conuenient good vse among vs, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamity. For when he maketh any danger to appeare, he doth after a certaine maner giue warning, that he is prepared or armed to reuenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countymen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a litle before, were had in examination. Euen as the Pastors of the Church should not do ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they would erie out vpon them to make haste to fasting and weeping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principall point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway ioyned with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ ioyneth it with weeping, when he requirith the Apostles from neede thereof, vntill the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. I speake of solemne fasting. For the priuate life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing and sobrietie, that in the whole countenance thereof there may appeare a certaine kind of fasting. But because all this matter shall be to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreat of the discipline of the Church, therefore I do now the more slenderly touch it.

The name of repentance improperly vnder the outward self-flourishing by words or otherwise although God do not abate reuenge, yet he doth exact shewes of weeping and sorrow for sins committed, and for more diligent confession of sinne.
Mat. 6. 17.

1. Cor. 11. 3.

18 But this one thing I wil adde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is vs. properly tuned from the naturall meaning which I haue aboue set forth of it. For it is not to charge a turning vnto God as a confession of fault with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine and guiltines. So to do penance in ashes and sackcloth is nothing else, then to vtter a displeasur when God is angrie with vs for grieuous offences. And this is a publicke kinde of confession, whereby we condemning our selues before the Angels and the world, do preuent the iudgement of God. For Paul rebuking their foolishnesse that tenderly beare with their own faults, saith: if we did iudge our selues, we should not be iudged of God. But it is not alway necessarie to make men openly of counsell and with all of our repentance: but to confesse priuately to God is a part of true repentance which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more vnreasonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the finnes in which we flatter our selues and doe inde them by hypocensie, leaſt he should bring them to light. And it behooueth vs not onely to confesse those finnes which we daily commit, but more grieuous offences offences ought to draw vs further, and to call againe into our remembrance things that seeme long agoe buried. Which Iohn Dauid giueth vs by his example. For being touched with thame of his newly committed fault, hee examineth him selfe euen to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, and confesseth that euen then he was corrupted and infected with the filthinesse of the flesh. And this he doth not to diminish the hainousnesse of his fault, as many hide themselves in the multitude, and seeke to escape punishment by wrapping other with them. But Dauid doth farre otherwise which with simple plamenes enforeth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancie, he hath not ceased to heape euils vpon euils. Also in another place he likewise examineth his passed life, that he craueth the mercy of God for the sinnes of his youth. And truly then onely shall we prooue our drouines to be shaken away from vs, if growing vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, we askereliefe of God. It is moreover to be noted, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that listeth vp as it were from death, them that either haue filthily fallen, or with vnbridled licentiousnesse haue throwen forth themselves to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious reuolting, haue shaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it reheateth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatrie and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threatneth mourning vnto sinners that haue not done penance for their wantonnes, fornication & vnchastitie. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare that few are called to penance, a more than carelesse assurednesse should creepe vpon vs, as though the mortifying of the flesh did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, doe not suffer vs to release. Therefore the speciall Repentance which is required but of some, whom the Deuil hath violently carried away from the feare of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary Repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Now if that be true, which is most euidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiveness of sinnes: doe wee not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely iustifie them that be his, that he may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness? Iohn the Angell sent before the face of Christ to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand. In calling them to Repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselves sinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lord, that they might with all their harts desire the mortifying of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he called them to Faith For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgiveness of sinnes, saluation, and life, and all that euer we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Euangelistes it is written, Iohn came preaching the Baptisme of Repentance vnto forgiveness of sinnes. And what is that else, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lord, and conceiue good hope of forgiveness and saluation? So Christ also began his preaching: The kingdome of God is come neere at hand: repent yce and beleeue the Gospell. In it he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then he requireth repentance, and lost of all confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when he meant bodily to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he said that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that Repentance and forgiveness of sinnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised vp by God, to giue to Israel repentance and forgiuenesse of finnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospell, that all their thoughts, their affections, their endeuors are corrupt and faultie, and that therefore it is necessary that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdome of God. Forgiuenes of finnes is preached when men are taught that Christ is made to them redemption, righteousness, saluation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are receiued by Faith, as I haue in another place declared: yet because the goodnesse of God whereby finnes are forgiven is the proper object of Faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from Repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of Repentance, openeth vs the first entry vnto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labor, are loden, are hungry and thirstie, and pine away with sorrow and misery: so must wee endeuour towards Repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to Repentance: he was sent to blesse the vnworthy, but so that euery one should turne himselfe from his wickednes. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiuenesse of finnes, he likewise vseth to require on our part Repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercie ought to be to men a cause to repent them, Doe (saith he) iudgement and righteousness, because saluation is comenere at hand. Againe, there shall come to Sion a Redeemer, and to them that in Jacob repent from their finnes. Againe, Seeke the Lord while he may be found: call vpon him while he is nere. Let the wicked leaue his way and the wickednes of his thoughts, and be turned to the Lord, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe, Turne ye and repent, that your finnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our Repentance were a foundation to deserue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to haue mercy vpon men to this end that they should repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauell if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wastle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our owne naturall soule. Plato saith in certaine places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall study and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it being vtterly flaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in vs. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire and goe no further, but rather that he should haue and long toward God, that being graised into the death and life of Christ, hee should study vpon a continuall repentance: as truly they cannot otherwise doe, that haue a naturall hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sinne, vntil he were first in loue with righteousness. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

Act. 3. 16.

Zeph. 2. 10.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well knownen by the doctrine aboue taught, that I neede not to reapeate a long discourse to prooue it againe. Therefore the Church prayeth and hath in admiration the benefite of God, that he hath giuen the Gentiles Repentance vnto blasion. And Paul commanding Timothy to be patient and milde toward the vnbelievers, saith: If at any time G O D giue them Repentance, th they may repent from the snares of the deuil. God indeed affirmeth that he willeth the conuersion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectuall working thereof hangeth vpon the Spirit of regeneration. Because it were more easie to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. The reason in the whole course of regeneration

we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Whomsoever the Lords will is to deliuer from death, those he quickeneth with the spirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cause of saluation, but because it is already seene that it is vnseparable from Faith and from the mercie of God: sith (as Esay testifieth) that there is a Redeemer come to him, and to those that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truly standeth stedfastly determined, that where soeuer liueth the feare of God, there the Spirit hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore in Esay, when the Faithfull complaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their hartes were hardened by God. The Apostle also meaning to exclude Apostataes from hope of saluation, appointeth this reason, that it is impossible for them to be renewed vnto Repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perish, sheweth a token of his fatherly fauour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with the beames of his cheerefull and merie countenance: on the other side with hardening them, he thundreth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is vnardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threatneth to wilfull Apostataes, which when they depart from the Faith of the Gospell, doe make a scorne of God, reprochfully despise his grace, and desile and tread vnder feete the bloode of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doth not (as some fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut off hope of pardon from all wilfull sinnes: but teacheth that Apostasie is vnworthy of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that God doth punish a contempt of himselfe so full of sacriledge, with vnappeasable rigor. For he saith that it is impossible, that they which haue once bene enlightened, haue tasted of the heavenly gift, haue bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tasted of the good worde of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they fall, should be renewed to Repentance, crucifying againe of new, and making a scorne of the Sonne of God. Againe in another place: If (saith he) we willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth received, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. These also be the places, out of the wrong vnderstanding whereof, the Negations in olde time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleued this to be a counterfaite Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes doe truly fauour of an Apostolik Spirit. But because we contend with none but with them that allow it, it is easie to shew, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their error. First it is necessarie that the Apostle agree with his Master, which affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemie shall be forgien, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgien neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnlesse we will make him an aduersarie to the grace of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weakenesse, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of a deuil.

22 But to discusse this, it behooueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall haue no forgienesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffenes cuen vnto death, with despaire of pardon, that doth not well agree with the very words of Christ, that it shall not be forgien in this world. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definition be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue euen vnto death. Whereas some other say that he sinneth against the holy Ghost, that enuieth the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once proued with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe

The definition of sinne against the holy Ghost: which sinne proceedeth not of ignorance but of malice.

Cap. 3. Of the maner how to receiue

ouerthrow all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the truth of God, with brightnesse whereof they are so dazeled, that they cannot pretend ignorance: which they do onely to this end to resist. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had said, immediately addeth: Hee that speaketh a worde against the sonne of man, it shall bee forgiven him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not bee forgiven. And Matthew for the blasphemie against the holy Spirit, putteth the Spirit of blasphemie. But howe can a man speake a reproch against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that itumble vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which do ignorantly speake euill of Christ, hauing yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed vnto them, or once with one worde offende him, whom they had knowen to be the Lords annointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospell, they would be readie to worship with all their hart. But they whose conscience is conuincd, that it is the worde of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet ceale not to fight against it, they are saide to blaspheme the holie Ghost: forasmuch as they wrastle against the enlightning that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Lewes, which when they could not resist the Spirit that spake by the Stephen, yet endeouored to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zeale of the law, but it appeereth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage against God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lorde inuiereth, which to ouerthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Bebelzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemie, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapeth foorth to reproch the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorantly committed those things through vnbeleefe, for which otherwise he had bene vnworthy of Gods fauour. If ignorance toynded with vnbeleefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is toynded to vnbeleefe.

23 But if thou make it well, thou shalt perceiue that the Apostle speaketh not of one or other particular fall, but of the vniuersall departing whereby the reprobate do forsake saluation. And it is no manuell, that they whom Iohn in his canonical Epistle affirmeth not to haue bene of the elect, from whom they went out, doe feele God vnappeseable. For he directeth his speech against them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling them from this false and pestilent opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that wittingly and willingly haue cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgresse the word of the Lorde, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceit is in these words of falling and sinning. Because the Nouantians expounde falling to be, if a man being taught by the lawe of the Lord, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, abstaineth not from stealing or fornication. But contrariwise I affirme, that there is a secret comparison of contraries, wherem ought to be repeated all things contrarie to that which was first spoken, so that heere is expressed not any particular fault but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when hee saith, they which haue fallen after that they haue once bene enlightened, and haue tasted the heauenty gift, and bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be vnderstanded of them, that with aduised vngodlines haue choked the light of the holy Spirit, haue spit out againe the taste of the heavenly gift, haue estranged them selues from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnder foote the word of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednesse, in an other place afterward he addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he saith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that sin willingly after knowledge of the truth receiued, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the priesthood of Christ) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospell is of set purpose renouced.

Heb. 10. 16.

24 But whereas some doe thinke it too harde and too far from the tender mercifullnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lordes mercie: that is easily answered. For he doth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lord: but he viterly denieth, that they can rise vnto Repentance, because they are by the iust iudgement of God stricken with eternall blindness for their vnthankfullnesse. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie that afterward he applyeth to this purpose the example of Esaus, which in vaine attempted with howling and weeping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatning of the Prophet, when they crye, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speech is meant neither the true conuersion, nor calling vpon GOD, but that carefulnesse of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compulid in extremitie to looke vnto that which before they carelessly neglected, that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they doe not so much call vpon, as they mourne that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fireteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so soone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue already saide, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preuenting it. Also his promise concerning calling vpon him, will neuer deceiue. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuently drawn, when they see that they must needs seeke God, that they may finde remedy for their euils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Conuersion and Prayer.

To them that sinne against the holy Ghost pardon is not denied if they repent, but repentance because they are vnorthic of pardon. Zach. 7. 13.

Ezec. 18. 21.

25 But a question is moued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained Repentance, how Achab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whom yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to haue bene onely stricken amazed with sodaine feare. He did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the ground, and (as it is testified of him) he was humbled before GOD: but it was not enough to cut his garmentes when his hart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet we see howe God is turned to mercy. I answer that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euer the wrath of God lyeth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got he thereby, but that he should not feele it aliuie in earth? Therefore the curie of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to be seene in Esaus. For though he had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was granted him at his weeping. But because the spirituall inheritance, by the Oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Jacob was chosen and Esaus refused, that putting away did exclude the mercy of GOD: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that he should be fatte with the fatte of the earth and the deaw of Heauen. And this is it that I said euen now, that it ought to be referred to the example of the other, that we should learne the more chearefully to applie our mindes and endeouours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truly and hartly turned, God will be ready to forgie vs, whose mercifulnes extendeth it selfe euen to the vnworthy, so long as they shew any griefe at all. And therewithall we be also taught, how terrible iudgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sport with no lesse shameles face than yron heart to despise and set nought by the threatnings of God. After this maner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Israell, to releue their miseries, although their crimes were counterfait, and their hearts double and false, as himselfe in the Psalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conuersion, or to make them vnexcusable. Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetual law thereby, but rather riseth somtimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their paines, that thereby may appeare how much fainting displeaseth him. But (as I haue saide) he sheweth some examples of his readines to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, and their pride may be the more grieuously condemned, that stubbornly kick against the pricke.

Although God for common examples sake doe sometimes remitt temporall punishments a possession a counterfeite repentance as in Achab, yet he is not without his true conuersion is not turned away. 1. Reg. 28. 19.

The iij. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babbie in their Schooles of Penance, is far from the purenesse of the Gospell. Where is entreated of Confession and satisfaction.

The schoolmens error both in defining and deuising repentance. The first is out of Gregorie, and is rehear'd lib. 4. Sent. Dist. 14. c. 1. The second out of Amb. & refer. illic, Sc in Decr. Dist. 3 de penitent. c. Penit. prior. The third out of August. refer. ca. Dist. c. Penit. post. The fourth out of Amb. refer. Dist. 1. Penit. c. Vera Penit.

NOW I come to discusse those things, which the Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will runne ouer in as few wordes as may bee, because I munde not to goe through all, least this booke, which I labour to draw into a short abridgement, should grow to a huge greatnesse. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, beeing a matter otherwise not verie hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining it, they shew that they neuer vnderstoode what repentance was. For they take holde of certaine sayings of the old writers, which do nothing at all expresse that nature of repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils passed, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorrie to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorrowe of heart, and bitternesse of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which hee hath consented. But, to graunt these things well saide of the fatiers (which a contentious man might easily enough denie) yet they were not spoken to this intent to describe repentance, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had bene drawn. But if we list to turne al such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adioyned as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysofome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift giuen from heauen, a maruellos vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the law. Yea and the doctrine which they afterward teach, is somewhat woorse then these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises, that a man can gather nothing else out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigoroufnesse that serueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chistice and punish vices: but they keepe maruellos silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is indeede much talke among them of Contrition and Attrition: they torment soules with many doubts, & do thrust into them much trouble & carefulnes: but when they seem to haue thoroughly wounded the hearts, they heale the bitterness with a light sprinkling of ceremonies. And when they haue thus curiously defined repentance, they diuide it into contrition of hart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically then they defined it, although they would seeme to haue wasted all their age in framing of syllogismes. But if a man will goe about to prooue by the definition (which kind of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may weepe for his sins passed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaile his euils passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may punish himself for that which he was sorrie to haue committed, &c. although he doe not confesse with his mouth: howe will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect that it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame me, but let them laye the fault in themselves that make not a purer and plainer definition, Truly (according to my grosseness) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their masterlike licence. Now let vs particularly consider all the parts in order. Where as I do negligently leape ouer as trifles those things that they with great grauitie of countenance do publish for mysteries, I do it not vnwittingly, (neither were it verie painefull for mee to confute all that they thinke themselves to haue deeply and subtely disputed) but I woulde thinke it against conscience to wearie the Readers with such trifles without any profite. Truly it is easie to knowe by the questions which they moue and tosse, and wherewith they miserable encomber themselves, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sin pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in other. Again: whether the punishments laid vpon man by God, do auile to satisfaction. Again: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sins: where they fouly and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for veniall sins. Likewise they very much torment themselves with a grosse error, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second bourde after shipwracke. Wherein they shew that they neuer waked from their brutish dulnesse, to feele so much as a farre off the thousandth part of their faults.

2 But I would the Readers should note, that here is not a quarrell about the shadow of an asse, but the most earnest matter of all others is intricated of, that is to say, forgouenesse of finnes. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of hart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that those three things are necessarie to the obtaining of forgouenesse of sins. But if it behou vs to know any thing at all in al our religion, this vuly behououeth vs most of all, I meane to vnderstande and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, vpon what condition, with what easinesse or hardnesse the forgouenesse of sins is obtained. If this knowledge stande not plaine and certaine, the conscience shall haue no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednes, but continually trembleth, wauereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horrible dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgouenesse of finnes hang vpon those conditions to which they doe binde it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Contrition the first part of obtayning pardon, and they require that to bee a true Contrition, that is to saie perfect and full: but in the meane time they doe not determine when a man may bee assured, that he hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contrition. Truly I grant that euery man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his finnes, to whet himselfe more and more to a loching and hatred of them. For this is a sorrow not to bee repented, that breedeth repentance vnto saluation. But when there is such a bitterness of sorrow required as may proportionally answer the greatnes of the fault, and such as may in balance counterpoise with the trust of pardon, heere the poore consciences are maruellously tormented and troubled, when they see themselues charged with a due contrition of sins, and do not so attaine the meaire of that due, that they can determine with themselues, that they haue duly performed so much as they duly ought. If they say that we must do as much as lyeth in vs, then come we still to the same point that we are at before: for how dare any man assure himselfe that he hath imployed all his force to bewaile his sins? So when the consciences haue long wrestled with themselues, and long bene exercised with battles, do at length finde no haven to rest in, yet somewhat to ease themselues, they enforce themselues to a sorrow, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

The pardon of our sins doth not depend upon the measure of our contrition.

Matt. 11. 18.
Esay. 61.
Luk. 4. 18.

3 But if they say that I slander them: Let them come forth and shew any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either bene driuen to dispaire, or hath not set for his defence a counterfaying of sorrow in steede of true sorrow, against the iudgement of God. We haue also our selues said in one place, that forgiveness of sinnes neuer commeth without repentance, because none but the afflicted and wounded with conscience of sinnes, can sincerely call vpon the mercie of God: but we haue therewithall further said, that repentance is not the cause of the forgiveness of sinnes. As for those torments of soules, which they say must be performed of dutie, we haue taken them away: we haue taught the sinner not to looke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to fasten both his eies vpon the onely mercie of God. We haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the labouring and loaden, when he was sent to publish glad tydings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preache remission to captiues, to deliuer prisoners, and to comfort them that mourne. From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, that filled with their owne righteousnes, do not acknowledge their owne pouertie, and also the despisers that careles of Gods wrath do seeke no remedie for their cuils. For such do not labour, nor are loaden, nor contrite in hart, nor bound, nor captiue. But there is great difference betwene teaching a man to deserue forgiveness of sins with due and full contrition, which the sinner can neuer performe: and instructing him to hunger and thirst for the mercie of God, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne vnquities, wearines and captiuitie, it may be shewed him, where he ought to seeke for reliefe, rest and libertie: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himselfe, to giue glory to God.

The grounds of Popish confession.

Gen. 3. 9.

4 Concerning confession, there hath bene alwaies great strife betwene the Canonistes and the Schoole diuines: while the one sort affirme, that confession is commaunded by the speciall commaundement of God, and the other sort denie it and say, that it is commaunded onely by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesse of the diuines, that haue corrupted and violently wrested as many places of Scripture, as they alleaged for their purpose. And when they saw that they could not so obtain that which they required, they which would be thought more subtle than the rest escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the lawe of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward receiued forme of the lawe Positiue. Euen as the foolishlest sort among the lawyers do say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is saide: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gauest me, &c. But that both citations & exceptions receiued from giuen them by the Ciuil law. But let vs see by what arguments they prooue this confession, either Formed or Vnformed to be the commaundements of God. The Lord (say they) sent the leprous men to the Priests. But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer heard it spoken, that the Leuiticall priestes

Matt. 8. 4.
Luk. 5. 15.

priestles were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, Deut. 17. 8. And say: It was commanded by the Lawe of Moses, that the priestles should discern betwene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spirituall leprosie: therefore it is the priestles office to pronounce vpon it. Before that I aunswere them, I aske this by the way, If this place make them iudges of the spirituall leprosie? why do they draw to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshy leprosy? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The lawe giveth to the Leviticall Priests the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpon vs. Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Now I answere: sith the priesthoode is removed, it is necessarie that the Lawe be removed also. All priesthoodes are removed to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthoode is also removed. If they loue so well to follow allegories, let him see Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape vpon his iudgement seate the free iurisdiction of all things: thus we can easily be contented to suffer. Morcouer their allegorie is verie vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is mecrely politike. Why then did Christ send the leprous men to the Priestles? That the Priestles should not caull that he did breake the lawe that commaunded the man healed of the leprosy, to be shewed before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commaunded the leprous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the lawe. Goe (saith he) and shewe your selues to the Priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commaunded in the Lawe that it should be for a witness vnto them. And truly this miracle should haue bene a witness vnto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christs miracles? Christ leauech to the his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still dally with it, therefore this worke is for a witness vnto the. So in another place: This Gospel shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. Again: Ye shall be led before kings and gouernors, for a witness to them, that is: that in the iudgement of God they may be more strongly conuined. But if they had rather follow Chryssostome: he also teacheth that Christ did this for the Jewes sake, that he should not be accounted a breaker of the Law. Albeit in so cleare a matter I am ashamed to allege the witness of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leauech the right of the lawe whole to the priestles as to the professed enuries of the Gospell, which were alway bent to cap against it, if their mouth had not bene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priests may still keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not proue that I can make a fairer shew of them for my side, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lord commaunded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they should vnbind and loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lorde saide this to the disciples: and it is much more likely that he saide to the Jewes that stood by him, that the miracle might be made the more euident without suspicion of fraud, and his power appeare the greater, that without any touching, with his onely word he raised vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lorde, to take away all wrongfull opinion from the Jewes, willed the to roll away the stone, to seele the ittincke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him using by the only power of his word, and then sit to seele him liuing. And this is the iudgement of Chryssostome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lorde gaue his Apostles power to loose. But how much more fitly and more handiömy might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lord meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose them that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those finnes that he had forgotten: that they should not condemne them for sinners whome he had acquitted: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgien: that they should not be rigorous to punish, and lightly offended, where he is mercifull and easily entreated to spare? Truly, nothing ought to moue vs more to readinesse to forgiue, than the example of the Iudge that threatneth that he will be vnappealeable to them that be too rigorous and vngentle. Now let them go and boast of their allegories.

Auricular confession weakly proued either by their acknowledging of their sins whom Iohn did baptize, or by S. Iames his willing men to make their mutuall confessions.

6 But now they ioine more neere hand with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to Iohns baptisme, did confesse their finnes, and Iames willeth that we confesse our finnes one to another. No maruile if they that would be baptized did confesse their finnes, for it was said before that Iohn preached the baptisme of repentance, and baptized in water vnto repentance. Whom should he then haue baptized, but them that had confessed themselues sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiuenesse of finnes: and who should be admitted to this token but sinners, and they that acknowledge them selues to be such? Therefore they confessed their finnes, that they might be baptized. And not without a cause doth Iames bid vs confesse one to another. But if they did make what followeth next after, they would vnderstand, that this also maketh little for them. Confesse (saith he) one to another your finnes, and pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutuall confession and mutuall prayer. If we must confesse to priests only, then must we also pray for priests only. Yea, What and if it might follow of the words of Iames that onely priests might confesse? for when he willeth that we should confesse one to another, he speaketh onely to them that may heare the confessions of other: his word is in Greeke Alletous, mutually, interchangeable, by turnes, or (if they so like best to terme it) by way of reciprocaion one to another. But so interchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meete to heare confessions. Which prerogative sith they vouchsaue to graunt onely to priests, we do also put ouer the office of confessing to them only. Therefore away with such triflings, and let vs take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple and plaine: that is, that we should lay our weaknesse one in anothers bosome to receiue mutuall counsell, mutuall compassion, and mutuall cöfort one of another: then that we being naturally pruy to the weakenes of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then alludge Iames against vs: which do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can confesse Gods mercy, vnlesse he haue first confessed his owne miserie. Yea we rather pronounce him accursed that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himselfe a sinner For the Lord hath concluded all vnder finnes, that all mouthes might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he onely iustified and exalted.

Gal. 3. 22.
Rom. 3. 9.

Auricular confession a meere humane constitution not grounded vpon any diuine Law.
This was the 183. Pope.

7 But I maruile with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the laue of God: the vsc whereof we graunt in deede to be verie auncient, but such as we are able to proue in old time to haue bene at liberty. Truly euen their owne chronicles declare, that there was no certaine Lawe or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient law, they would rather haue taken hold thereof, than haue bin contented with the decree of the councill of Laterane, and so made themselues to be laughed at, euen of children. In other things they sticke not to make forged decrees, which they father vpon the most auncient Councils, that they may with very reuerence of antiquitie dazle the eyes of the simple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a false pack. Therefore by their owne witness, there are not yet passed three hundred hundred yeeres since Innocent the third laide that snare vpon men, and charged them with necessitie of Confession. But, to speake nothing of the time: the very barbarousnes of the wordes minisheth the credite of that lawe. For where these good fathers command euery one of both kindes, male and female, once euery yeare to confesse all his sins to his own priest, pleasant men do merily take exception, that in this commandement are contained onely Hermaphrodites, and saye that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onely. Since that time, a more grosse beastlinesse hath beuwaited it selfe in their schollers, that cannot expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoeuer all the Popes hyred bablers do prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the authour of this law that compelleth men to reckon vp their sins, and also that there passed a thousand and two hundred yeeres from the resurrection of Christ before that any such law was made. And so, that this tyrannie was then first brought in, when all godlinesse and learning being destroyed, the viors of Pastors had without choise taken all licentiouines vpon them. Morcouer there are euident testimonies both in histories and other ancient writers, which teacheth that this confession was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a law made by Christ or his apostles. I will alleage but one out of many, which shall be a plain prooffe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitution of bishops was diligently kept in all the West churches, but specially at Rome. Wherby he sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all churches. But he saith that there was one of the priests peculiarly appointed to serue for this office. Wherby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men doe falsely say of the keyes giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthood. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall dutie of some one that was chosen thereunto by the Bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hauious offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he saith immediately after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman fainting that she came to confession, was founde so to haue coloured vnder that pretence the vnbondst company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nicellanus a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Heere, heere let these asses lift vp their eares. If particular confession were the law of God, how durst Nicellanus repell and destroy it? Wil they accuse for an heretike and schismaticke Nicellanus a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voices of all the old fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not onely let slip for a time, but also discontinued euen till within time of his remembrance. Yet let them condemne of apostasie not onely the Church of Constantinople, but also all the East Churches which haue neglected that lawe, which (if they say true) is inuolable and commanded to all Christians.

Tripart. hist. lib. 9

8 This abrogation Chrysofostome, which was also bishop of Constantinople eoth in so many places euidently testifie, that it is maruel that these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (saith he) thy sins that thou maist do them away, if thou be ashamed to tell any man the sins that thou hast done, tell them daily in thy soule. I doe not say Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that is the care of them. with nothing, but will most gently heale thee. Againe: Tell not man, least hee reproch thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellow seruant, that may vter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Physitian. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call manie witnesses, tell thy sinne to me alone priuately, that I may heale thy sore. Shall wee say that Chrysofome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliuer mens consciences from these bonds wherewith they be bound by the law of God? not so. But he dare not require that as of necessitie, which he doth not vnderstand to be commanded by the word of God.

The Scripture requireth confession of finnes, but vnto God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer and easier, first we will faithfully rehearse, what kind of confession is taught by the word of God: and then we will also declare their inuentions, but not all (for who could draw out such an infinite sea?) but onely those wherein they comprehend the summe of their secret confession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the old translator hath giuen in translation this worde Confesse in steede of Praise: which the grossest vnlearned men commoulie know: sauing that it is good to haue their presumptuousnesse bewraied, that do giue away that which was written of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannicall commandement. To prooue that confession availeth to cheere the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psalm: In the voice of reioycing and confession. But if such change may serue, then we shall haue what we list, prooued by what we list. But seeing they are to become past shame, let the godly readers remember that by the iust vengeance of God they haue been cast into a reprobate minde, that their presumption shoulde be the more detestable. But if we wil rest in the simple doctrine of the scripture, wethal not be in danger of any such deceits to beguile vs. For there is appointed one order of confessing, that forasmuch as it is the Lorde that forgiveth, forgetteth, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confesse our sins to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Physitian, therefore let vs shewe our diseases vnto him. It is he that is greued and offended, therefore let vs seeke peace at his hand. Hee is the knower of hearts, and priuie to all thoughts, therefore let vs make haste to powre out our hearts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him.

Psal. 13. 5.

Psal. 51. 5.

Dan. 9. 5.

1. Ioh. 1. 9.

I haue (saith Dauid) made my sinne known vnto thee, and haue not hidden my vnrighteousnesse. I haue said, I will confesse against me my vnrighteousnes to the Lord, and thou hast forgiven the wickednes of my hart. Such is the other confession of Dauid. Haue mercy vpon me O God, according to thy great mercy. And such is the confession of Daniel: We haue sinned, Lord we haue done puerly, we haue committed iniquities, and haue been rebellious in swaruing from thy commandments. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in Scripture, the rehearsal whereof woulde almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our finnes (saith Iohn) the Lord is faithfull to forgive vs our finnes. To whom shoulde wee confesse? euen to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled and humbled hart before him, if hartily accusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodness and mercy.

A confession of our finnes openlie vs occasion shall require euen vnto men also allowable.

2. Sam. 12. 13.

10 Hee that hartily and before God shall embrace this confession, shall vndoubtedly haue both a tooing readie to confesse, so oft as it shall be needfull for him to publish the mercie of God before men, and not onely to whisper the secret of his hart to one man, and once and in his care: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his own shame and the magnificence & glorie of God. After this manner when Dauid was rebuked of Nathan, hee was pricked with the sting of conscience, and confessed his sinne before both God and man. I haue (saith he) sinned to the Lord, that is to say, now I alleage nothing for my excuse, I vse no shifts, but that all men may iudge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would

would haue had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glorie of God or for the humbling of our selues. For this reason the Lords in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speake the words, and the people saying after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he foresaw that this help was necessarie for them, that euery man might be the better brought to a iust reknowledging of himselfe. And meeie it is that with the confession of our owne miserie we should among our selues, and before all the world glorifie the goodnes and mercie of our God.

11 And it is conuenient that this kinde of confession be both ordinary in the Church, and also extraordinarily vsed in speciall manner, if it happen at any time the people to be guiltie of anie generall fault. Of this second kinde we haue an example in that solemne confession which all the people vsed by the meanes and guiding of Esdras and of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City and Temple, the dissolving of religion, was the punishment of the common reuoluing of them all: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliuerance in such sort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselves. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulness. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselues gather some infection and beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrenesse or any other plague: if it be our ducie to sile to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltines: then confession it selfe, whereupon all these things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinarie confession, beside that it is commended by the Lords owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For where as in all holie assemblies we make our apparance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of vnworthinesse? But that (some man wil saie) is done by euery prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our finnes. I graunt. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or drowsinesse, or sluggishnes, you wil graunt me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemne vse of confession, the Christian common people should be exercised to humbling themselves. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Israelites, was parcell of the nurture of the law, yet in some manner it also belongeth to vs. And truly we see that this vse is in well ordered Churches profitably obserued, that euery Sunday the minister should rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe and of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craveth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this keie the gate to praier is opened as well priuately to iudicimanes vniuersally to all men.

12 Moreover the Scripture alloweth two formes of priuate confession, one that is made for our owne sake, wherof that saying of James is spoken, that we should confesse our finnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesse one to another, we should one help another with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appeale him and reconcile him vnto vs, when we haue in anie thing bene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although James in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should vnloose ourselves, let such vs a free choyse to confesse to him that shall seeme meekest vnto vs of all the flocke of the Church: yet we ought principally to choyse the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be iudged meekest. I say that they are meekest in comparison of the rest, because the Lord appointeth them by the veyre calling of their ministerie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to vniuade & correct our finnes, and also may receiue comfort by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutuall admonishment and reproofing is committed to all men, yet it is specially enioyned to the ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort and confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercie: yet we see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the forgiveness of sinnes, are ordained as it were witnessles and pledges thereof, in so much that they be saide to forgue sinnes and loose soules. When thou hearest this to be ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profite. Therefore let euerie one of the faithfull remember this to be his dutie, if he be priuately so vexed and troubled with the feeling of sinnes that he cannot wande out himself without help of another, not to neglect the remedie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to vse the priuate confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the priuate help of him, whose dutie it is both publicly and priuately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospell. But alwaie this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certainty, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those onlie that shall vnderstand themselves to haue neede of it. Then that euen they that vse it for their neede, should not be compelled by anie commaundement, or trained by anie decree, to reckon vp ail their sinnes, but so farre as they shal thinke it behoouefull for them, that they may receiue sound fruit of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leaue this libertie to the churches, but also to maintaine it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will haue tyrannie absent from their ministerie and superstition from the people.

13 Of the ether sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthem. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there rememberst that thy brother hath anie thing against thee, leaue thy gift there, and go, and first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity that hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and craving pardon of the offence that we haue committed. Vnder this kind is contained their confession that haue sinned euen to the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the priuate offence of one man, to forbid from holie mysteries all them that haue sinned against their brother, till they be with iust amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euill example, should recouer the fauour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian receiued againe to the communion, when he had yeilded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vsed in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (saith he) in due time, and then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the Bishop and the Clergy, they receiue leaue to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture vterly knoweth not, and it is not our duty to bind consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I do so much not speake against it that the sheepe should present themselves to their shepheard when they meane to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladlie haue it euery where obserued. For both they that haue an encombred conscience, may fro thence receiue singular profit, and they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

3. Col. 2. 6.

*A commendable kinde of absolu-tion correspondent

kinde of confession.*

14 In these three kinds of confession, the power of the keyes hath place: that is, either when the whole church with soleme reknowledging of their faults craueth pardon: or when a priuate man, that by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloseth his weakenes vnto him. But there are diuerse waies of taking awaie offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is prouided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be taken away, and

and mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this vs̄e that I haue spoken of, is not to be despised, that we may the more willingly confesse our finnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the iudgement seate of God, confesseeth it selfe guiltie, and hath one onely refuge vnto the mercie of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christs embassador, hauing commandment of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitableness of the keyes is worthily commended, when this embassage is performed rightly, and with such order and religiousnes as becometh it. Likewise when he that had in a maner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiueth pardon and is restored into brotherly vnitic: how great a benefit is it that hee vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgiven by them, to whom Christ hath said: To whomsoeuer ye forgieue sins in earth, they shall be forgiven in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnes and profit is priuate absolution, when it is asked by them that haue need of speciall remedie to relieue their weaknes. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithfull, remaineth neuertheles in some doubt, and hath stil an vnquiet minde, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: and the same man, if he haue disclosed to his person the secret store of his minde, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospell, Thy sins are forgiven thee, be of good hope, stablisheth his minde vnto assurednes and is deliuered from that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keyes, wee must take heed that we dreame not of a certaine power seuered from the preaching of the Gospell. In another place we shal haue occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shal entreat of the gouernment of the church: and there shall we see that all the power to binde and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his Church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mysterie of the keyes, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospell be publicly and priuately sealed vp in the hearts of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which cannot be done but by onely preaching.

Mat. 18. 19.
Ioh. 20. 23.

15 But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euerie one of either kinde, so soone as they come to the yeeres of discretion, must yeerely once at the least confesse all their sins to their owne priest: and that their sin is not forgiven, vnlesse they haue firmly conceived an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offered that they may do it, there is now no more entrie open for them into Paradise. And that the priest hath the power of the keyes, wherewith he may loose & bind a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vaine. Whatsoeuer ye bind, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselues. Some say that there is but one keie in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is indeed requisite for a good vs̄e, but that it is only as an accessorie & is not essentially ioined with the other. Some other, because they sawe this to be too much an vnbridled licence, haue reckoned vp two keyes, discretion & power. Other againe, when they saw the leud boldnes of priests to be restrained by this moderation, haue forged other keyes, that is to say, authority, of discerning which they should vs̄e in giuing determinate sentence: and power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: and that knowledge standeth by as a counsellor. But they dare not simply expound this binding & loosing to be to forgieue & put away sins: because they heare the Lord crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy finnes, O Israell. But they say it is the priests office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare whose sins are forgiven or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolueth and retaineth sins, or by sentence when he excommunicateth and receiueth againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they vnderstand that they bee not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be objected against them, that oftentimes their priestes do binde and loofe men vnworthie, which are not therefore bound or loofed in heauen: then (which is their last refuge) they answere that the giuing of the keies must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his iudgement feat such sentence of the Priest shall be allowed as hath been iustly pronounced, according as the deseruings of him that is bound or loofed, did require. Moreouer, they say, that these keies are giuen by Christ to al priests, and are deliuered to them by their Bishops, at the time of their promoting to priesthood: but the free vse of them remaineth onely with such as do exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended Priests haue indeed the keies, but rustie and bound vp. And they that say these things may well seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which vpon a newe aniuell haue forged newe keies with which they say the treasure of the Church is locked vp. These keies we shall heereafter try in place fit for it.

A tyranny to impose vpon men a law binding them to reckon vp all their finnes.

Pla. 19. 13.

Pla. 38. 5.

16 Now I will in few wordes answere to euery one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, so far as we will consider that when place serueth. But where they charge men with a law of reckoning vp all their finnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiven but vpon condition, if there bee an intent conceiued to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all finnes be reckoned vp? But David, (who as I thinke) had well studied vpon the confession of his finnes, yet cried out: who shall vnderstand his errours? Lord cleanse me from my secret finnes. And in another place. My iniquities haue passed about my head, and like a weightie burden haue waxed heauie about my strength. Truly he vnderstoode how great was the bottomlesse depth of our finnes: how many were the sorts of our mischieuous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon vp a register of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cried vnto the Lord: I am ouerwhelmed, I am buried and choaked, the gates of hels haue compassed me, let thy hand draw me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and readie to die. Who now may thinke vpon the numbring of his finnes, when he seeth that David can make no number of his?

The miserie wherewith their soules were vexed which had a care and did make a conscience of confessing in such sort as the Church of Rome required.

17 With this butcherie, the soules that haue been touched with any feeling of God, haue become more cruelly vexed. First they called themselves to account: then they diuided finnes into armes, into bowes, into branches, and into wigges, according to these mens rules: then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a little forward. But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on each side skie, and on each sea, no haven, no safe roade: the moe that they had passed ouer, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as high mountams, and there appeared no hope, nor so much as after long compassings, any way to escape. And to they did sticke fast betweene the sacrifice and the stone, and at last was found no other issue but desperation. Then these cruel butchers, to ease the wounds that themselves had made, laid certaine gentle plaisters, that euery man should do as much as he could. But new cares againe rose vp, yea new torments did flea the silly soules, as to thinke: I haue not employed time enough, I haue not enclouered my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I haue passed over many things by negligence, and the forgetfulness that cometh by negligence is not excusable. Then were there ministered other plaisters to asswage such paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligence: if it be not altogether carelesse, it shall be pardoned. But all these things cannot close vp the wound, and are not so much easement of the euil, as poyson couered with honie, that they should not with their bitterness offend the first taste but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth vpon them and soundeth in their eares: Confesse all thy finnes. And this horreur can not be appeased but by assured comfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what sins they haue done euery day: forasmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at euening he shall reckon vp the faults but of one daie, his memory is confounded therewith, so great a multitude and diuersitie presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse and blockish hypocrites that thinke they haue done sufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greatest sins: but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which whoe they see themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, doe adde also this saying of Iohn: If our owne hart doe accuse vs, God is greater than our hart: and so they quake for feare at the sight of that Iudge, whose knowledge far surmounteth our vnderstanding.

1. Iohn 3. 20.

18 But whereas a great part of the world rested them vpon such flatteries, whether so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they believed that God was satisfied, or because they themselues were fully satisfied: but that the anchor cast as it were in the mid sea, should rest a litle from sailing, or as a way-faring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For euery man may be witness to himselfe, I will in a short summe shew, what manner of Law this was. First simple it is impossible, and therefore it can doe nothing but destroy, damne, confound, and cast in ruine and desperation. And then when it hath led sinners from the true feeling of their finnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselues. For while they are wholly busied in reckoning vp of their finnes, in the meane time they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthines, by knowledge whereof they should chiefly haue weighed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our euill to be so great as passeth our vnderstanding. After this rule we see that the Publicanes confession was made, Lord be mercifull to me a sinner: as if he should say: All that euer I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I cannot attaine with wit or expresse with tooing the greatness of my finnes: let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercy swallow vp the bottomlesse depth of my sinne. But then thou wilt say, what? are not all our finnes to be confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knitte vp in these two words, I am a sinner? No, but rather we must endeuour our selues as much as in vs lieth, to poure out our hart before the Lord, and not onely in one word confesse our selues sinners, but also truly and hartily acknowledge our selues to be such: and with all our thought record, how great and diuerse is our filth of finnes, not onely that we be vnclene, but what, how great, and in how many partes is our vnclenenesse: not onely that we be debtors, but with how great debtes wee be laden, and how many waies charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with how many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowldging when the sinner hath wholly powred out himselfe before God, let him earnestly and sincerely thinke, that yet there remaine moe finnes, and that the secret corners of their euils are so deepe, that they cannot be thoroughly disclosed. And he cryeth out with David: Who vnderstandeth his errors? Lord cleanse me from my hidden finnes. Now where they affirme that sins are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmly conceiued, and that the gate of Paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuenesse of finnes, than alwaies hath bene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their finnes in the care of some Priest, that we read to haue obtained forgiuenesse of finnes at Christs hand. And truly they could not confesse, where there were neither any Priestes confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vheard of, at which time finnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the worde of God is plaine, which abideth for euer: Whensoever the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this word, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that iudgement cannot be giuen but when the cause is heard, we haue a solution in readinesse, that they do presumptuously take that vpon themselves, which haue made themselves Iudges. And it is a maruell that they doe so boldly frame to themselves such principles, as no man in his right wit will graunt. They boast that the office of Binding and Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine iurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Moreouer their whole doctrine cryeth out, that this authoritie was vnknowne to the Apostles. Neither doth it belong to the Priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainele whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as he that heareth can neuer know whether the reckoning be iust and perfect. So should there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be iudged. Moreouer the whole order of Loosing standeth of Faith and Repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen vpon another man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of Binding and Loosing is not subiect to the iudgement of an earthlie Iudge: because the minister of the word, when he doth his office, can not giue absolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the sinnes sake, Whose sinnes ye forgiue, &c. that they should not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the Commandement and word of God, shall be ratified in Heauen.

Eze. 18. 21.

Auricular confession is a meane to make men not ashamed of sinning but bold so sinne.

19 Therefore it is no maruell, if we condemne and desire to haue vterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many waies hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath giuen cause to so many wickedneses, sacrileges and errors, who will not thinke that it ought to be presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vses, which they boast vpon as very profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One onely they commend with a singular prerogative, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, wherby the sinner both is for a time to come made warer, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humble a man with shamefastnesse enough when we call him to that high iudgement seate of heauen. I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth very wel profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge we cease to sin, and be not ashamed to haue God witnes of our euill conscience. Although the very same is also most false, for it is to be seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when men hauing made confession to a Priest, thinke that they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not onely they are made all the yeere long the bolder to sinne: but all the rest of the yeere bearing themselves bold vpon confession, they neuer sigh vnto God, they neuer returne to themselves, but heape sinnes vpon sinnes, till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke them selues discharged of their burden, and that they haue taken away from God the iudgement that they haue giuen to the Priest, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulness when they haue made the Priest priuie. Moreouer who doth merilie see the daie of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull heart, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backward, like as if hee weretaken by the necke and drawn to prison? vnlesse peradventure it be the very Priestes, that vse ioyfully to delight themselves with mutual rehearals of their doings, as it were with merie tales? I will not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth full. Onely this I say, if that holy man did not vniwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confession cession out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to be done at this day vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incests, and bawderies.

20 Where the Confessioners alledge for this purpose the power of the Keyes, and doe thereupon set the poupe and proue of their kingdome, as the prouerbe is: it is to be seene how much they ought to auale. Then (say they) are the Keyes giuen without cause? Is it said without cause: Whatsoeuer you loose vpon earth, shall be also loosed in Heauen? Doe we then make the word of Christ void? I answere there was a weightie cause why the Keyes should be giuen, as both I haue euen now already declared, and shall more plainly shew againe when I come to entreat of Excommunication. But what if I doe with one sword cut off the holde of all that they require, that is, with saying, that sacrificing Priests are not the vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also be to be intreated of in an other place: but now they raise vp an engine whereby they would most of all defend themselues, and thereby may all their buildings be ouerthrowen. For Christ did not giue his Apostles the power to binde and loose, before that he gaue them the holy Ghost. Therefore I say, that none haue the power of the keyes that haue not first receiued the holy Ghost. I deny that any man can vse the Keyes but hauing the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trifling say, that they haue the holy Ghost. But indeede they deny it, vnlesse peradventure they saie (as they doe saie indeede) the holy Ghost to be a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they shall not be beleecued. And by this engine they are vtterly ouerthrowen, that of whatsoeuer doore they boast that they haue the Keye, a man may alway aske them whether they haue the holy Ghost which is the Iudge and gouernour of the Keyes. If they answer that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghost may erre. This they will not be glad to speake expressly, although they crookedly vtter the same by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no Priests haue power of the Keyes which doe commonly without consideration loose those things that the Lord would haue to be bound, and bind those things that the Lord commanded to be loosed.

21 Whereas they see themselues conuincd by most cleere experiments, that they doe without choice loose and binde the worthie and vnworthie, they vturpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not deny that knowledge is requisite for a good vse, yet they write that the very power is giuen to cuill disposers of it. But this is the power, whatsoeuer thou bindest or loosest in earth, shall be bound or loosed in heauen. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that haue this power doe well binde and loose. Neither may they dally and say, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the desertings of him that is bound or loosed. And we also confesse, that none can be bounde or loosed, but they that are worthe to be bound or loosed. But the Messengers of the Gospell and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this worde the Messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgiveness of sinnes in Christ by Faith, they may proclaime damnation vnto all and vpon all that embrace not Christ. In this worde the Church pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, theues, manslayers, couetous men, vnjust men, haue no part in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with most sure bondes. With the same worde the Church looseth them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power shall this be, not to know what is to be bounde or loosed, and not to be able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then doe they say that they loose by authoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vn certaine? What haue we to doe with this imaginatiue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it already proued that either there is no vse of it, or so vn certaine an vse as may be accounted for none at all. For whereas they Authoritie granted to binde and loose is no authorizing of Popish priestes to absolute in such sort as they doe.

Cap. 4. Of the maner how to receiue

confesse that there is a great part of Priestes that do not rightly vse the keies, and that the power without lawfull vse is of no effect. Who shall assure me that he of whom I am loosed is a good vsfer of the keies? If he bee an euill vsfer of it, what hath hee else but such a voide disposing of them, as to saie, what is to be bound or loosed in thee I know not, for as much as I lacke the right vse of the keies, but if thou deserue I loose thee. But so much might do, I will not say a laie man (for they could not beare that with patient eares) but a Turke or a Diuill. For it is as much as to say, I haue not the word of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power giuen mee to loose thee, if thy deseriings be so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keies to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing: and that knowledge is adioyned for a counsellor, and like a counsellor serueth for a good vse: vndoubtedly euen they desired to raigne at their owne will, licentiously without God and his word:

The uncertaintie and absurdities of popes absolution.

22. If any man take exception and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangeth vpon faith shall alway remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a cold comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competent iudge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: we haue answer thereunto in readinesse. For they say that no sinnes are forgiven by the Priest, but such whereof himselfe hath bene the bearer: so by their opinion, the forgiveness hangeth vpon the iudgement of the Priest, and if he do not wisely discern who be worthinie of pardon, the whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power wherof they speak, is a iurisdiction adioyned to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomles depth. For where the confession is not found, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the Priest himselfe must needs sticke in suspence while he cannot tell, whether the sinner do faithfully reckon vp all the euill decdes. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of priestes) the most part are no fitter to do this office, than a thoomaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a manner all ought worthily to suspect themselves. Hereupon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulness of the Popes absolution, because they will haue it grounded vpon the person of the priest, and not onely that, but also vpon knowledge, that he may iudge onely of things informed, examined and proued. Now if a man should aske of these good doctours, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiven: I see not what they haue to answer, but that they shall be compelled to confesse that all is vnprofitable, that the Priest pronounceth of the forgiveness of those sinnes that he hath heard rehearsed, so long as the other sins are not deliuered from condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth how hurtfull carefulnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he resteth vpon the priests discretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainly by the worde of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleere from all these absurdities. For the absolution is conditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that hee sincerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, and obey the grace offered him. So hee cannot erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is giuen him in instructions by the word of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the master himselfe. Be it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath bene wickedly despised in the Papacie.

Things spoken of the Gospell and of excom. v. 11. 12.

23. How foolishly they confounde those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of the keies, I haue promised that I will speake in another place, and there shall be a more conuenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the government.

ment of the Church. But let the readers remember that those things are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secret confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they obiect that the power of loosing is given to the Apostles, which Priests may vse in forgiving sinnes acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fond principle, because the absolution that serueth Faith, is nothing else but a witness of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth vpon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secrete sinnes but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they serape together here and there testimonies, to proue that it sufficeth not to confesse sinnes either to God onely or to laie men, vnlesse a Priest be the hearer of them, their trauell therein is but lewd, and such as they may be ashamed of. For when the Auncient Fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselves to their owne Pastour, it cannot be expounded of particular rehearfall which then was not in vse. Then Lombard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme of set purpose to haue giuen themselves to fained bookes, by pretence whereof they might deceiue the simple. They doe indeede truly confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth Repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with Repentance, although he haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the Priest doth not so much forgive sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Albeit in the word of declaring they slyly bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremony in steede of doctrine. But whereas they patch vnto it, that he is absolved in the face of the Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they doe inconueniently draw to the peculiar vse of euery particular man, that which wee haue already saide to be appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a humous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they deprauce and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgiving, with an enioyning of penalue and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to part that in halves, which God hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when he simply requireth Repentance and Faith, this partition or exception is a very robbetrie of God. For it is in effect as much as if the Priest taking vpon him the person of a Tribune, should become intercessor to God and would not suffer God of his meere liberalitie to receiue him into fauour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seates and there hath been punished.

the maintenance of auricular confession, vaine doubtles concerning what should be done if they that confesse, corrupt instructions of penalties and satisfactions laide vpon them that are absolved.

24 The whole summe cometh to this point, that if they will make God the Author of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falsehood condemned, as I haue prooued them false forgers in the fewe places that they alleadge. But sith it is euident that it is a Law made by man, I say that it is both tyrannicall and made iniuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his word, will haue them free from the bondage of man. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lord would be free, I say that this is a sacriledge not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgive sinnes, wherein consisteth saluation for vs. Moreouer I haue shewed that this tyranny was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthy barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore soules in whom fouler abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carelesnes, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, and so maketh them duller. Last of all I haue declared, that whatsoeuer mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and deprauce pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitfull colours.

Auricular confession an humane constitution, established in most corrupt times of the Church, bringing some to desperation and some to be carelesse, impossible to be defended or coloured by any shift in the world.

enough for him that repenteth, to abstaine from his former euils, and change his behaviour into better, vnlesse he make satisfaction to God for those things that he hath done: And that there be many helpes by which we may redeeme sins, as weeping, fasting, oblations and the works of charitie. With these we must winne the Lord to be fauorable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousnesse of God, with these we must make amendes for our faultes, with these we must deserue pardon. For although by the largnes of his mercie he hath forgien our fault, yet by the discipline of his iustice he retaineth the paine, & that this is the paine that must be redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they saie cometh to this point, that wee doe in deede obtaine pardon of our finnes at the mercifullnesse of God, but by meanes of the deseruing of our workes, by which the offence of our finnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may be fully made to Gods righteousnesse. Against such lies, I set the free forgiveness of finnes, than which there is nothing more evidently spoken of in the Scripture. First, what is forgiveness, but a gift of meer liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgive, that acknowledgeth by acquittance that the money is paide, but he that without any payment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the debtors bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore do they ye. set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Esaie, It is I, it is I, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindfull of the finnes: doeth hee not openly declare that he fetcheth the cause & foundation of forgiveness only from his owne goodnes? Moreover whereas the whole scripture beareth this witness of christ, that forgiveness of sins is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then do they teach that it is receiued by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they deny that they giue this to satisfactions, although they say that the same be vsed as helps by way of meanes. For whereas the scripture saith By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we alleage nothing of our owne, but rest vpon the onely commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirmeth that God is reconciling the world to himselfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sins, he immediately sheweth the meane and maner how, because he that was without sinne, was made sinne for vs.

26 But (such is their perversnesse) they say that both forgiveness of finnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme receiued into the fauour of God by Christ: that after Baptisme we must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profecth nothing, but so far as it is distributed by the keys of the Church. Neither do I speake of a doubtfull matter, forasmuch as they haue in most euident writings bewraied their owne filthines, and not one or two of them, but all the Schoolemen vniuersally. For their master after that he had confessed that Christ had paid the penaltie of finnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediately correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in baptisme all temporall penalties of finnes are released, but after baptisme they are minished by the helpe of penance, that so the crosse of Christ and our penance may worke together. But Iohn saith farre otherwise, if any sin, we haue an aduocate with the father, euen Iesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our finnes, I write vnto you children, because your finnes are forgiven you for his names sake. Truly, hee speaketh to the faithfull, to whom when he setteth foorth Christ to be the propitiation of finnes, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God being displeased, may be made fauorable and appeased. He doth not saie: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, nowe seeke you other meanes, but hee maketh him a perpetuall aduocate, alway to restore vs by his intercession into the fauour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our sins may be cleansed away, For this is euer true that the other Ieha said: Behold, the Lambe of God, behold him that taketh away the finnes of the world. He taketh them away (saith he) himselfe and none other, that is to say, forasmuch as he alone is the Lambe of God, he alone also is the oblation for finnes, he alone the propitiacion sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgie belongeth properly to the father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the sonne, as wee haue already seene: Christ is heere set in another degree, that taking vpon himselfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltinesse before the iudgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shall no other wise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, vnlesse the same honour remaine whole with him, which they do wrongfully take to themselves that go about to appease God with their owne recompensings.

27 And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and vaminished: and that the consciences being assured of the forgiuenesse of sinne, may haue peace with God. Esaie saith, that the father hath laide the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that wee shoulde bee healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes saith: that Christ did in his body beare our finnes vpon the tree. Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sin for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sin was slaine in his flesh, when he was giuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sins with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadfull iudgement of God, and condemnation of death shoulde be cast. Heere those triflings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, every one of vs doth none otherwise feele the effectualnes of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisf:ctorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the onely satisfaction of Christ. Nowe set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuenesse of finnes: that if we afterwarde fall, to the obtaining of a second forgiuenesse, our workes do worke with it. If these things may haue place, do these things that are heere before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It is a marvellous great difference, betweene this that our iniquities are laid vpon Christ, that they shoulde be cleansed in him, and this that they are cleansed by our owne workes: between this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if we speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to heare that his sins are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shall alway be vexed, & alway quake for feare. For they that rest vpon light petie satisfactions, do too contemptuously esteeme the iudgement of God, and do little consider how great is the greuousnes of sinne, as we shall declare in another place. But although we graunt them to redeeme some sins with iust satisfaction: yet what will they do when they are oppressed with so many finnes, for satisfaction whereof an hundred lues although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuenesse of finnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yoonglings, but to the already regenerate children of God, and them that haue bene long nourished in the bosome of the Church. That embassidge which Paul so honourably extol-
 2. Cor. 5. 20.
 I beseech you in the name of God, be yee reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had bin already regenerate. But he bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ. So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the blood of the crosse hath pacified all things in heauen or in earth, he restraineth not this to the onely moment wherein we are receiued into the church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easily appeereth by the proesse of the text, where he saith, that the faithfull haue a redemption by the blood of Christ, that is forgiuenesse of finnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together in our places, that

They can not yeeld vnto Christ that honour which they shoulde nor finde that peace in their owne consciences which they might haue had by resting vpon the force of their owne satisfactions.

The idle distinction of sins veniall and deadly sins.

Heere they flee to the sanctuarie of the foolish distinction, that some sins are veniall, and some deadly: that for deadly finnes is great satisfaction due, that veniall finnes are purged with more easie remedies, as with saying of the Lords prayer, with springling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and tuffle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth veniall and deadly sinne, yct they could neuer discern the one from the other, sauing that they make vngodlines and vncleannes of hart a veniall sinne. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) doe pronounce, that the reward of sinne is death, and that the soule that sinneth is woorthy of death. But that the finnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they doe not deserue death, but because by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I knowe how vniustly they slander this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoicks strange conclusion, concerning the equalitie of finnes. But they shall easily bee conuincd by their owne mouth. For I demaund of them, whether among the very same finnes that they confesse to be deadly, they doe not acknowledge one to bee greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately followe, that finnes are equal, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitiuely saith, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obedience of the Law is the way of life, and that the transgression of the lawe is death, they cannot escape this sentence. What ende of satisfiing then will they finde in so great a heap of sins? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sin, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrap themselves in many sins, sith the iustest man passeth no one day wherein he falleth not many times. Nowe when they shall prepare themselves to make satisfaction for the finnes, they shall heape vp great numbers, year rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfiing being cut off, what do they stay vpon? how dare they still thinke of satisfiing?

They goe about to winde out themselves: but (as the prouerbe is) the water still cleaueth vpon them. They forge a distinction of fault and penalty. They confesse that the fault is forgiven by the mercy of God, but that when the fault is forgiven, the penaltie remaineth which the righteousnes of God requireth to be paid; and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God, what a skipping lightnes is this? now they confesse that the forgiveness of the fault lieth freely open for men which sometime they teach men to deserue with prayers and weepings, and all other kinds of preparations. But yet still all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgiveness of finnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I haue already more then sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherewith these winding snakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not be able once to folde in the toppc of their tail. This is the new Testament which the Lorde hath couenanted with vs in Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learne by another Prophet, where the Lord saith: If the righteous turne away from his righteousness, I will not remember all his righteousnesses. If the wicked depart from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he saith that he will not remember their righteousnesses, that is as much to say, that he will haue no regarde of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember finnes, is as much as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such manners of speech the holy Ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning vnto vs, if we woulde apply vnto him willing eares to learne. Truly, if God do punish finnes, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to iudgement, he doth not lide them: if hee examine them: he doth not cast them behinde his backe: if he looke vpon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if he sift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordes. If God haue couered sinnes, then he would not looke vpon them: if he would not looke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not knowe them, he had rather pardon them.

Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they should not bee seene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of another place of the prophet, vpon what conditions the Lord forgiveueth sinnes. If (saith he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snowe: if they be red like crimson, they shall be as wooll. And in Jeremy we read thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shall be sought for, and shall not be found: the sinne of Judah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remnants that I shall preferue.

Wilt thou briefly vnderstand what is the meaning of those wordes? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth binde vp iniquities in a sacke, doth gather them into a bundell and lay them vp, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an adamant stone. If they signifie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shall be giuen for recompence, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lord affirmeth, that hee remiteth all recompensing of vengeance. Heere I must beseech the Readers not to harken to my glosses, but onely that they will suffer the word of God to take some place.

30 What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did beare all our sinnes in his bodie vpon the tree, we meane nothing else thereby, but that he suffered all the paine and punishment that was due vnto our sinnes. And the same hath Esay more lucly declared where he saith: the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vpon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to sinnes: and which we should haue suffered before that we could be reconciled to God, vnlesse that hee had entered into our stead? Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffered the paines of sinnes, to deliuer them that be his from them. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Christ, he useth to call it in Greeke Apolutrosin, whereby he meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the verie price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gaue himselfe Antilutron, a price of ranfome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lord (saith Augustine) but sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death in Christ? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of sinnes, ministrerh vs a strong battell ramme. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that manner of satisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth most diligently and in most exact order set out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe cometh it to passe, that he commaundet out all the ceremonies of expiation, howe cometh it to passe, that he commaundet out recompence faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely sacrifices for satisfaction, but because his will is to declare, that there is onely one kinde of satisfaction, whereby his iudgement is appeaed? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their truth, that is to saie, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what manner of recompence the Lord receiveth of vs, Osée hath verie well expressed in few wordes. Then shalt (saith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, heere is forgiveness of sinnes. And we shall pay thee the value of our lippes: Loe, heere is satisfaction. I knowe that they doe suttly slippe away, when they make distinction betwene euerslasting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of punishment that God taketh as well of the bodie as of the soule, except onely euerslasting death, this restraining of it doth little helpe them. And so oft as Dauid or the other Prophets doe craue pardon of finnes, they do also therewithall pray to be released of the paine. Yea, the verie feeling of Gods iudgement doth driue them thereunto. Againe, when they promise mercy at the Lords hand, they do in manner alwaie of purpose preach of the paines and the forgiveness thereof. Truly, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne sake, not for the Iewes sake, he doth sufficientlie shew that both are of free gift. Finally, if we be deliuered by Christ from guiltines of fault, the paines that come thereof, must needs cease.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arme themselves with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of arguments those be that they alleage. Dauid (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie and manslaughter, receiued pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterward punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. We are taught to redeme with satisfactions such paines as were to be extended after forgiveness of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeme his finnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlines, iniquities are forgiven. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of finnes is couered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth. Againe, in Luke the Lord saith of the woman that was a sinner, that many finnes are forgiven her, because she hath loued much. How peruerlie and wrongfully they euer wey the doings of God, But if they had marked (as they should not haue ouerpassed it) that there are two kinds of Gods iudgement, they would haue seene in this rebuking of Dauid, a farre other maner of punishment, than such as might be thought to tend to reuengement. But because, it not a little behooueth vs all to vnderstand whereunto the chastisements haue respect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our finnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shall be not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kinde of iudgement, the iudgement of reuenge, the other of Chastisement. It is to be vnderstanded, that God so punisheth his enemies with the iudgement of reuenge, that he vseth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is ioyned with his indignation: with the iudgement of chastisement he dealeth not so cruelly, as to be angrie: nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a Iudge, the other of a Father. For the Iudge when he punisheth an euill doer, he hath regard to the offence, and punisheth the verie fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his childe, he doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teach him, and make him warier in time to come. Chrysostome in a certaine place vseth a similitude somewhat differing from this, but yet it cometh to the same point. The sonne (saith he) is beaten, and the seruant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bondseruant, because he hath offended, and the other is chastised as a free man and as a sonne, needing correction. To the one his correction serueth for prooffe and amendment, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

not of reuenge
but of chastisement

Comparison

God punisheth his enemies in wrath, his children in loue.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter shortly and in a ready summe, let this be the first of two distinctions. Wheresoeuer punishment is to reuenge, there sheweth it selfe the curse and wrath of God, which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwise, Chastisement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimonie of his loue, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is comonlie euery where sufficiently sufficiently expressed in the word of God. For whatsoever afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out vnto vs as it were a certain jentrie of hell, from whence they do alreadie see a farre off their eternall damnation : and they are so farre from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginnings they are prepared to the most cruell hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chastising chastiseth his seruants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confesse that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vnto true instruction. But as we read euery where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quiet minde, so they haue alway praied to escape the first kind of scourges. Chastice me Lord (saith Jeremie) but in thy iudgement, not in thy wrath, least thou destroy me. Poure out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowne thee, and vpon the kingdoms that haue not called vpon thy name. And Dauid saith: Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that ofentimes it is said, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth their sinnes. As in Esaie: I will confesse to thee O Lord, because thou hast been angry with me: thy wrath is turned, and thou hast comforted me. Againe Abacuc. Thou that hast bene angry shall remember mercy. And Michee: I will beare the wrath of the Lord, because I haue sinned against him. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull haue asswagement of their sorrow, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is saide that he doth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he will neuer defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheth, but of the vehemēt feeling of sorrow which they feele that suffer any of his seueritie whatsoever it bee. But he not onely pricketh his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselves not farre from the damnation of hell. So he testifieth that they haue deserued his wrath, and so it behooueth that they shoulde loath themselves in their euils, and be touched with the greater care to appeale God, and carefully make haste to craue pardon. But euen in the very same dooing he sheweth a more euident testimonie of his fauourable kindnes than of his wrath. For the couenant continueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the truth wherof he that cannot decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall neuer be made voide. If (saith he) his children forsake my lawe, and walke not in my iudgements: if they defile my statutes, and keepe not my commandments; I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Of which mercy to make vs assured, he saith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shall be of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreme and deathly horroure, that feele the hand of God to be against them. How great regard he hath of this lenitie in chastising his Israel, hee sheweth in the Prophet: I haue purged thee (saith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou shouldest haue bene all consumed. Albeit he teacheth that chasticements serue him for to cleanse him, but hee further saith, that he vseth the same so temperately, that hee be not too much consumed by them. And that is needfull. For the more that euery man reuerently searcth God, and giueth himselfe to follow godlines, so much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath. For the repobate, although they groane vnder his scourges, yet for that they weigh not the cause, but rather turne their backe both to their owne sinnes & to the iudgement of God, by that slouthfulness they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmur and kicke against him, and do make an vprore against their iudge, that furious sudden rage astonieth them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descend to consider their sinnes, and being stricken

The miseries wherunto we are subject would swallow us up if we did not

33 Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are stricken with the scourges of God, they do alday after a certaine maner begin to suffer paines by his iudgement, and though they shal not escape vnpunished, for that they haue not taken heede to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they should prouee God to be a iudge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they should thereby be punished of God for their sinnes, but that they should thereby profite to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather haue respect to the time to come, then to the time past. This I had rather expresse in Chrysostomes words than mine owne. For this (saith he) God doth lay paine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so saith Augustine: That which thou sufferest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chastisement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Knowe yee brethren that all this miserie of mankinde when the world groneth is medicinall sorrow, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I haue therefore thought good to alleage, that the manner of speech that I haue aboue written, should not seeme to any man new and vnused. And hereunto serue all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lord oftentimes doth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffely despised all punishments. In Esaï he saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to the crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shall be sufficient to haue briefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdome, he punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from Dauid his yong sonne, hee corrected him to amendment. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul saith, we are iudged of the Lord, we are corrected that we should not be damned with this world: That is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heauenly father, this is no paine wherewith we should be confounded, but onely a chastisement wherewith we should be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainly on our side. For he teacheth that the paines wherewith men are alike chastised by God, are diuersly to be considered: because to the holy ones they are battels and exercises after the forgiuenesse of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiuenesse paines of wickednesse. In which place he rehearseth how paines were laide vpon Dauid and other godly men, and saith, that the same tended to this ende, that their godlinesse should by such humbling of them, be exercised and proueed. And where Esaï saith, that the Iewish people had their iniquitie forgiuen them, because they had receiued full chastisement at the Lordes hande: this proueeeth not that the pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the full paiement of the paine: but it is in effect as much as if he had saide: Because ye haue already suffered paines enough, and by the greuousnesse and multitude thereof haue bene now pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is now time that receiuing the tidings of full mercie, your harts should reioyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the person of a father, which repenteth him euen of his iust seueritie, when he was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessarie that the faithfull be furnished in bitterness of afflictions. It is time that the iudgement began at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called vpon. What should the children of God doe, if they did beleue the seueritie of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For he that being stricken stricken by the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing iudge, cannot conceiue him but angrie and enemie vnto him, and detest the verie scourge of God as a curse and damnation. Finally, he can neuer be perswaded that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is still minded to punish him. But he only profreth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angrie with his finnes, but mercifull and louing to himselfe. For otherwise that must needes happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where he saith. Thy wrathes, O God haue passed ouer me: thy terrors haue oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, because we haue fainted in thy wrath: and we haue bene troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secrets in the light of thy countenance: because all our dayes are gone away in thy wrath: our yeeres are consumed as the word that is passed out of a mouth. On the other side Dauid saith thus of his fatherly chastisements, to reach that the faithfull are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lord, and hast instructed in thy law, to giue him quiet from cuill dayes, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a hard tentation, when God sparing the vnbeleeuers and winking at their faults, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gaue them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learne, that it is done to prouide for their saluation when they are called againe into the way, and the wicked are caried headlong into their errors, whose end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be cuerlasting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and sicknes, as the iudgement of eternall death are the curses of God: when they are laid vpon men to this end, to be instruments of the Lords wrath and vengeance against the reprobate.

35 Now (as I thinke) all men do perceiue whereunto tended that chastisement of the Lord vpon Dauid: euen to be an instruction that God is greuously displeased with manslaughter and adulterie, against which he had shewed so great indignation in his beloued and faithfull seruant: that Dauid should be taught to be no more so bold to do the like deede: and not to be a paine whereby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be iudged of the other kind of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Dauids disobedience whereinto he was fallen in numbring the people. For he did in deede freely forgive to Dauid the guiltinesse of his sinne: but because it pertained both to the publike examples of all ages, and also to the humbling of Dauid, that such a hainous offence should not remaine unpunished: therefore he most sharply chastised him with his rod. Which marke also we ought to haue before our eyes in the vniuersall course of mankind. For whereas after pardon obtained, we do all yet suffer the miseries that were laid vpon our first parent for paine of sinne, we perceiue our selues by such exercises to be admonished, how greuously God is displeased with the transgression of his law: that being throwne downe and humbled with knowledge in conscience of our owne miserable estate, we may the more seruently aspire to true blessednes. But he shall be most foolish that shall thinke, that the calamities of this present life are laid vpon vs for the guiltinesse of sinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chrysostome when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines vpon vs, that he should call vs. persevering in cuils to repentance, then wher repentance is once shewed, the paine shall be superfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for euery mans nature, so he handleth one man more roughly, and another with more louing tendernes. Therefore where he mindeth to teach that he is not vmeasurable in taking punishments, he reprocheth to the hard hearted and obstinate people that being stricken yet they make not an end of sinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was a cake scorched on the one side, and raw on the other, because the corrections did not pearce into their mindes, that the people hauing their vices knowe that he which afflicteth vs doth it as a father and not as a Iudge.

boiled out, might be made meete to receiue pardon. Truly he that so speaketh, sheweth, that so soone as a man hath repented, he will by and by become appeasable: and that by our stiffness he is enforced to that rigour in chastising of faults, which should haue bene preuented with willing amendment. Yet forasmuch as we all are of such hardnesse and rudenesse, as vniuersally needeth chastisement: it seemed good to him being a most wise Father, to exercise all without exception with a common scourge all their life long. But it is mercellous why they so cast their eyes vpon the onely example of Dauid, and are not moued with so many examples, in which they might haue beholden free forgiveness of sinnes. It is read that the Publicane went out of the Temple iustified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his teares we reade (saith Ambrose) his satisfaction we reade not. And the man sicke of the Palsie heard it spoken to him: Rise: thy sinnes are forgiven thee. There was no paine layd vpon him. All the absolutions that are rehearled in the Scripture, are set out as giuen freely. Out of this great number of examples a rule should rather haue bene gathered, than of that only example that containeth in it a certaine speciall matter.

36 Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counselleth Nabuchadnezer to redeeme his sinnes with righteousness, and his iniquities with pitying of the poore: his meaning was not to say, that righteousness and mercy are satisfactorie appeasements of God, and redemption of paines (for God forbid that there were euer any redemption sauing only the blood of Christ) but to referre this word Redemcing rather to men than to God, as if he had sayd: O king, thou hast vsed an vnrighteous and violent government, thou hast oppressed the humble, thou hast spoiled the poore, thou hast hardlie and vniustlie handled thy people: for thy vniust exactions, for thy violence and oppression, now render to them mercie and righteousness. Likewise Salomon saith, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is couered: not before God, but among men themselues. For thus is the whole verse: Hatred raiseth vp contentions, but charitie couereth all iniquitie. In which verse, as his manner is, he doth by waye of comparison of contraries, compare the euils that grow of hatreds, with the fruites of charitie: in this meaning, they that hate together, do one bite, barke at, reproch and raile at an other, and turne all things to the worst, but they that loue together, do dissemble many things among themselues, do winke at many things, and pardon many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, and helpeth them with admonishing, rather than galleth them with reproching them. And it is not to be doubted that Peter alleageth this place in the same sense, vnlesse we will accuse him of deprauing and wrongfully wresting the scripture. But whereas he teacheth that sin is purged with mercifulnes and liberalitie, he doth not meane that recompence is therewith made for sin before the face of the Lord, so that God being appeas'd by such satisfaction doth release the paine that otherwise he would haue laide vpon them, but after the accustomed manner of the Scripture he declareth that they shall finde him mercifull vnto them that leauing their former vices and iniquities, doe turne to him by godlines and truth: as if he should saie, that the wrath of God doth cease and his iudgement rest, when we cease from our euill doings. Neither doth he there describe the cause of pardon, but rather the manner of true conversion. As many times the Prophets do declare that Hypocrites do in vaine pester God with forged cceremonious vsages in steede of repentance, whereas it is vprightnes of life with the duties of charitie that delighteth him. As also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues commending liberalitie and gentlenes, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And when Christ, taunting the Pharisees that giuing heede onely to cleansing of dishes, they neglected the cleanness of the heart, commaunded them to giue almes that all might be cleane: he did not thereby exhorte them to make satisfaction: but only teacheth what manner of cleanness pleaseth God. Of which kinde of speech we haue intreated in another place.

37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sound iudgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, will make vs any controuersie thereupon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not know the woman, which he had so easily receiued into his presence. For he thought that Christ would not haue receiued her, if he had knowen her such a sinner as she was. And thereby he gathered, that Christ was not a Prophet that might in such sort be deceiued. The Lord, to shewe that thee was no sinner to whom her finnes were alreadye forgien, did put out this parable. There were two debtors to one creditour vpon vsurie: the one ought fifty, the other ought five hundred, both had their debts forgien them. Whether oweth more thanke? the Pharisee answered: he to whom most is forgien. The Lord replied: learne hereby that this womans finnes are forgien her, because she hath loued much. In which wordes (as you see) he maketh not her loue the cause, but the prooffe of the forgiveness of her finnes. For they are deriued vpon a similitude of that debtour, to whom sine hundred was forgien, to whom he did not say that therefore it was forgien, because he had loued much: but therefore loued much, because it was forgien. And hereunto must that similitude be applied in this sort: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner: but thou oughtest to know that she is none such, for as much as her finnes be forgien her. And that her finnes be forgien her, her loue ought to prooue vnto thee, whereby she rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is prooued by signes eniuing. By what meane she obtained forgiveness of finnes, the Lord openly testifieth: Thy faith, saith he, hath saued thee. Therefore we obtaine forgiveness by faith: By charitie wee giue thanks, and testifie the bountifullnesse of the Lord.

The loue which the woman to whom many finnes were forgien did shew towards him which did forgive her, was not a cause, but a prooffe of her pardoning.
Luce. 7. 35.

38 As for those things that are commonly found in the bookes of olde writers concerning satisfaction, they little moue me. I see indeed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whose bookes remaine, haue either erred in this point, or spoken too crabbedly and hardly: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and vnskillful as to haue written those things in that sense that the new Satisfactionars do read them. Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercie is required, examination ceaseth: where mercie is asked, iudgement is not rigorous: where mercie is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercie, there is no inquisition. Where is mercie, the answer is pardoned. Which wordes howsoever they be wrested, yet they can neuer be made to agree with the schoolemaisters doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiasticall doctrines, which is fathered vpon Augustine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of finnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was saide to be giuen in recompence of finnes committed, was euen in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedfulnesse in abstaining from finnes in time to come. I will not allege that which the same Chrysostome saith, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we should confesse our finnes vnto him with teares sith such sentences are manie times found in his writings and others. Augustine in deede in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obtaine forgiveness of sins: but because no man should stumble at that little word, he himselfe preuenteth it in another place. The flesh of Christ (saith he) the true and onely sacrifice for sins, not onely these finnes that are wholly put away in baptisme, but also these that afterward creepe in by weakenes: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgiue vs our trespaffes. And they are forgien by that singular sacrifice.

The Fathers though speaking somewhat hardly concerning satisfactions, do notwithstanding meanes far otherwise than these new satisfactioners.

rendred to God, but an open declaration wherby they that had bin excommunicate when they would be receiued againe to the communion, did ascertaine the Church of their repentance. For there were ioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might perswade men that they were truly and heartily wearie of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former dooings: and so they were saide to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these wordes in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that auncient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day vsed, tooke their beginning. Truly verie viperous birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I said euen now, I do not deny that peraduenture they erred herein. But those things that were besprinkled with a fewe spots, when they are once handled with these mens vnwashed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we must contend with the authoritie of old writers: good God, what old writers do they thrust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnfauorice dotages of certaine Monkes that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine and Chrysostome. As about this present question he taketh in a manner all out of Augustines booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth indeede the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, woulde vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I doe not so narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that tediousnes. For to me it should not be verie laboursome, and yet verie plausible to bewray to their great shame those things that they haue heretofore boasted vpon as mysteries, but bicause my purpose is to teach fruitfully, therefore I passe them ouer.

Thev. Chapter.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatorie.

The world euen reuolungly abused by pardons.

Of this doctrine of satisfactions do flowe indulgences or pardons. For they say that that which our power wanteth to make satisfaction, is supplied by these pardons. And they run so fure sooth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merits of Christ and of the Martyres, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his bulles. But although they haue more neede of Helleborus to purge their frenke braine, thn argumentes to aunswere them, so that it is not much woorthie the traualle to stande vpon confuting such trifling errors, which are alreadie shaken with many battlerammies, and of themselues growe into decayed age, and bende toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shall be profitable for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons haue so long stand safe, and haue so long bene vnpunished, hauing bene vsed with so outrageous and furious licentiousnes: this may serue to teach vs in how darke a night of errors, men in certaine ages past haue bene drowned. They saw themselues to be openly and vncolouredly scorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainful markets to be made of the saluation of their soules, the price of saluation to be valued at a fewe pence, and nothing set out to be freely giuen: that by this colour they bee wiped of offerings to be filthily spent vpon brothels, bawds and banquetings, that the greatest blowers abroade of pardons are the greatest despisers of them, that this monster doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnesse ouer-runne the worlde, and growe into outrage, and that there is no ende, newe leade daily, dayly brought, and new money gotten. Yet with hie reuerence they receiued, they worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest saw somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceites, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit: At the length, since the world suffered it selfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, and by litle and litle become frozen, till they vtterly vanish away.

2. But for as much as many that see the filthy gaminges, the deceites, thestes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners haue heretofore mocked and beguiled vs, yet see not the very fountaine of vngodlines from whence they spring: it is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spots. They call the treasure of the Church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyres. The principall custodie of this barne (as I haue already touched) they faime to be deliuered to the Bishop of Rome, that he should haue the distribution of so great giftes, that he might both giue them by himselfe, and also graunt iurisdiction to other to giue them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred daies: from Bishops, pardons for fortie daies. But they be (as I may naturally describe them) the profaning of the blood of Christ, Satans mockerie, to leade away the Christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of saluation. For how could the blood of Christ be more filthly profaned, than when it is denied to suffice, to the remission of sinnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, vnlesse the want thereof as being withered and wasted, should be otherwise supplied and perfected? The law and all the Prophets (saith Peter) beare witness of Christ, that by him forgiveness of sin is to be receiued: Pardons giue remission of sinnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The blood of Christ (saith Iohn) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons doe make the blood of Martyrs the washing away of sinnes. Christ (saith Paul) which knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him: Pardons doe set the satisfaction of sinnes in the blood of Martyrs. Paul cried out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul and other died for vs. In an other place he saith that Christ purchased the Church with his blood: the pardons appoint an other price of purchase in the blood of Martyrs. The Apostle saith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for euer them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrary and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. Iohn saith that all the Saintes washed their Gownes in the blood of the Lambe: the pardons teach men to wash their Gownes in blood of Saintes.

3. Leo Bishop of Rome, writeth notablie well to the Palesines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of many Saintes hath beene precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath bene the propitiation of the world. The righteous receiued, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantest of the faithfull are grauen examples of patience, not giftes of righteousness. For their deaths were euery one singular to themselves, and none of them did by his end pay the debt of an other, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthy to be remembred) he repeated in an other place. There can nothing be required more plaine to destroy this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no lesse fitly to the same effect, Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the blood of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiveness of sinnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that we should follow him, but hath giuen vs a thing to reioice vpon. Againe in an other place, As onely the Sonne of God was made the Sonne of Man, to make vs with him the Sonnes of God: so he alone for vs hath taken vpon him punishment without euill deseruings, that wee by him might without good deseruings, obtaine grace not due vnto vs. Truly whereas all their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacriledges and blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselves whether these be not their decrees: that the martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and deserued more, than was needfull for themselves: and that they had remaining so great a plentie of deseruings, as did also ouerflow vnto other: and that therefore, least so great goodnes should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, & of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission and satisfaction of sins. And that so is the saying of Paul to be taken: I supplie in my body those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his body, which is the Church. What is this else but to leaue Christ onely his name, otherwise to make him but a common petie saint, that may scarcely among the multitude be known from the rest? Hee onely, onely shoulde haue bene preached, he onely set forth, he onely named, he onely bene looked vnto, when the obtaining of forgiveness of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of: But let vs heare their curialled arguments. Least the blood of the Martyrs shoulde be shed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefite of the Church. Is it so? was it no profite to glorie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their blood? by despising this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by their steadfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, and ouercome the stubbornnes of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profite of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely be the propitiator, if he onely died for our sins, if he onely was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might neuertheless haue obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beds. And whereas they haue sought euen to the shedding of their blood, it would not agree with the iustice of God to leaue the same barren and fruitelesse. As though God could not tel how to encrease in his seruants their glorie, according to the measure of his gifts. But the church receiueth in common together profite enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

Saint Pauls words of supplying that which wanted in Christs sufferings: misericordie wrested to this purpose
Col. 1. 24.

4 But how maliciously doe they wrest that place of Paul where he saith, that he supplieth in his bodie those things that wanted of the sufferings of Christ? for hee referreth not the default of supplying to the worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation: but to those afflictions wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to saie, all the faithfull must be exercised so long as they shall be in this flesh. Hee saith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he daily suffereth in his members the same that he once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsafeth to doe vs so great honour, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. Whereas Paul addeth these words, For the Church, hee meaneth not for the redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profite of the Church. As in another place he saith, that he suffereth all things for the electes sake, that he may obtaine the saluation which is in Christ Iesu. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that he suffered all the troubles that he suffered, for their comfort and saluation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when he saith further, that he was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospell of Christ. If they yet require another expositor, let them heare Augustine. The sufferings of Christ (saith he) are in Christ onely as in the head: and both in Christ & the Church, as in the whole bodie. Whereby Paul being one member saith, I supplie in my bodie that which wanteth in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore if thou whatsoeuer thou be that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoeuer thou sufferest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wanted in the sufferings sufferings of Christ. But wherunto the sufferings of the Apostles taken for the Church of Christ do tend, he expoundeth in an other place where he saith: Christ is to me the gate vnto you: because ye are the sheep of Christ bought with his blood: acknowledging your price, which is not giuen of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth, As he hath giuen his soule, so ought we to giue our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and confirme Faith. These are Augustines words. But God forbid, that I should haue thought that any thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnes of righteousness, saluation and life, or that he meant to adde any thing thereunto, which so plainly and honorably preacheth, that the aboundance of grace was so largely powred out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it onely all the Saints haue bene saued, and not by the merite of their owne life or death as Peter expressly testified: so that he should be slanderous against God and Christ, that should repose the worthines of any Saint any where else than in the onely mercie of God. But why doe I tarry hercupon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doubtfull, sith the very bewraying of such monstrous errors is a sufficient confutation of them?

5 Now (to passe ouer such abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose in leade and parchment the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the worde of the Gospell? Truly either the Gospell of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospell, with all aboundance of heauenly benefites, with all his merites, with all his righteousness, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deliuered to the ministers, whereby they might vse this forme of message as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: we beseech you, be yee so reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sinne, to be made sin for vs, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. And the faithfull know of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offered vs to be enioyed in the Gospell. Contrariwise the pardons doe bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, and fasten it to leade parchment, yea and to a certaine place, and seuer it from the worde of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to haue proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could beare, they which felt themselves aboue measure oppressed with penance enioyed them, required of the Church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompences whereby men may redeeme themselves from the iudgement of God, then they therewithall did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatorie remedies, to deliuer vs from deserued punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can haue no colour at all.

6 Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed downe, and ouerthrown from the very foundations. For I doe not agree to some men, that thinke best to dissemble in this point, and make no mention at all of Purgatorie, whereupon (as they say) great contentions doe arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my selfe would also thinke such trifles worthe to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as Purgatorie is builded of many blasphemies, and is daily vpholden with new blasphemies, and raiseth vp many and grieuous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might afort haue been dissembled for a time, that it was inuented by curious and bold rashnes without the worde of God: that men beleued of it by I wot not what reuelations, fained by the craft of Satan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested.

Cap. 5. Of the maner how to receiue

Deut. 18. 21.

Albeit the Lord giueth not leaue to mans presumptuousnes so to breake into the secret places of his iudgements, and hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his worde, and permitteth not his worde to be so vnreuerently defiled. But let vs graunt, that all those things might for a while haue bene borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sins is sought else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must crie out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throate and sides: that Purgatorie is the damnable deuse of Sathan, that it maketh void the Crosse of Christ, that it layeth an intollerable slander vpon the mercie of God, that it febleth and ouerthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that ouerthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediately ouerthrowen by the verie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the blood of Christ is the onely satisfaction, propitiatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the sins of the faithfull: what remaineth but that purgatorie is a meere and horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe over the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the same spring of vngodlines.

That sin against the ho'y Ghost shall neither in this world, nor in the world to come be forgiven, is a fl vnderproof for Purgatorie.
 Math. 12. 32.
 Mar. 3. 28.
 Luk. 12. 10.

7. But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they haue falsly and wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lorde affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost should not be forgiven in this worlde, nor in the world to come, thereby he sheweth that there is a forgiveness of some sinnes in the world to come. But who seeth not that the Lord there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Now if it be so, what is that to their purgatorie for as much as by their opinion the pain is there suffered of those sins, wherof they deny not the fault to be forgiven in this present life? But that they may no more carpe against vs, they shall haue yet a playner solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from so heinous wickednes, he thought it not ynough to say that it should neuer be forgiven, but the more to amplify it, he vsed a diuision, wherein he comprehended both the iudgment that euery mans conscience feeleth in this life, & the last iudgment that shall be openly pronounced at the resurrection: as though he should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of most present damnation. For he that of set purpose shall endeavour to quench the light of the holy Ghost, shall not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to sinners for their conuersion, nor in the last day when the lambes shall be seuered by the Angels of God from the goates, and the kingdom of heauen shall be cleansed from all offences. Then they bring forth that parable out of Matten: Agree with thine aduersarie, least he deliuer thee to the Iudge, and the Iudge to the Sargeant, & the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, vntill thou hast paid the vttermost farthing. If in this place the iudge do signifie God, and the aduersarie plainthe the diuel, the Sargeant the Angell, and the prison purgatorie, I will gladly yeeld vnto them. But if it be euident to all men, that Christ meant there to shew into how many dangers and mischiefs they cast themselves, that had rather obstinately pursue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equity and good right, to the end to exhort his disciples the more earnestly to agreement with equity: where then I pray you shall Purgatorie be found?

 Mal. 3. 10.

8. They fetch an argument out of the saying of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heauen, earth, and hels, shall bow to Christ. For they take it as confessed, that hels cannot there be meant of those that are adiudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatorie. They did not reason verie euill, if the Apostle did by kneeling meane the true godly worshipping. But such he teacheth onely, that there is dominion giuen to Christ,

Christ, whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what prooffe is there to the contrary, but that we may by helts vnderstande the Devils, that shall bee brought before the iudgement of God, to acknowledge him their iudge with feare and trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expoundeth the same prophecie in another place. All (saith he) shall be brought before the iudgement seate of Christ. For it is written. So truly as I liue, euerie knee shall bow to me, &c. But we may not so expound that which is in the Reuclation: I haue heard all creatures, both these things that are in heauen, and those that are vpon the earth, and these that are vnder the earth, and those that are in the sea, and all those that are in them, I haue heard them all say to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lambe, Blessing, and honor, and glorie, and power for euer & euer. That I do in deed easily grant, but what creatures do they thinke to be here rehearsed? For it is most certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reason & without sense. Whereby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the parts of the worlde, from the highest top of the heauens to the very middle point of the earth, do in their maner declare the glorie of their creator. As for that which they alleage out of the history of the Machabees, I will not vouchsafe to answer it, least I shoulde seeme to reckon that worke in the number of the holy bookes. But Augustine receiued it for Canonically. But first, of what sure credit did he receiue it? The Iewes (saith he) esteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they do the law, the Prophets, and the Psalmes, of which the Lord himselfe hath witnessed as of his witnessess, saying: It was necessary that all things should be fulfilled that are written in the law, & the Psalmes, and Prophets concerning me. But it hath bene receiued of the Church not vnprofitable, if it be soberly read or heard. And Jerome teacheth without any doubting that the authoritie thereof is of no force to proouing of doctrines. And it evidently appeereth by that old booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creede, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I heere stande without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficientlie shew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craueth pardon, if he haue spoken any thing not well. Truly he that confesseth his writings to neede pardon, saith plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost. Beside that, the godlines of Iudas is praised for none other cause, but for that hee had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doth the writer of that historie referre that which Iudas did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithfull, that had died for their countrey and religion. This doing was in deed not without superstition and preposterous zeale, but they are more than fooles, that draw a sacrifice of the lawe so far as vnto vs: forasmuch as we knowe that things do cease by the coming of Christ, that then were in vse.

9 But they haue an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which cannot so easily be battered. If any man (saith he) build vpon this foundation, gold, siluer, precious stones, timber, heye, stubble, the Lord shall shewe euery mans worke what it is: because it shall be reuealed in fire, and the fire shall trie euery mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it shall suffer losse, but he shall be safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of purgatorie? by which the filthines of sinne are clesed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdome of God? But the most part of the olde writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the crosse, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they shoulde not rest in the filthines of the flesh: and that is much more probable, than in faining purgatorie. Albeit I do neither agree with these men; because I thinke I haue attained a certaine and much plainer vnderstanding of that place. But before that I vter it, I woulde haue them answer me, whether the Apostles and all the Saints must haue gone through this fire of Purgatorie? I know they will say, nay. For it were too much inconuenient that they must haue needed to be purged, whose merites they dreame to ouerflowe aboute measure to all the members of the Church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say that the worke of some shall be proued, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustines, which so confureth that exposition. And (which is more absurditie) he doth not say, that they shall passe through the fire for all works: but if they haue faithfully builded the Church, they shall receiue reward when their worke is examined with fire. First, we see that the Apostle vsed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines inuented by mans braines, wood, hey, and stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant rescue: that as wood so soone as it is put in the fire, consumeth and wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to follow the true cause of his Metaphore, and match the partes together with iust relation, he called the triall of the holy Ghost, fire. For euen as the neede that gold and siluer are put to the fire, so much the surer prooffe they haue of their goodnes and sinceresse: so the Lords truth, the more exactly it is weyed with spirituall examination, so much the greater confirmation of credite it receiueth. As hey, wood, and stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudder consuming, so the inuentions of men, not stablished by the word of God, cannot beare the triall of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fall away and perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and stubble, because like wood, hey, and stubble, they are burned with fire & destroyed: but they are not destroyed or drinen away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth that the holy ghost is the fire wherwith they shall be proued, whose prooffe Paul, according to the comon vse of the scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called, the day of the Lord, whensoeuer he doth any way shew his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his truth shineth vpon vs. Nowe haue we proued, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the triall of the holy Ghost. But how are they saued by the fire, that suffer losse of their worke? That shall not be hard to vnderstand, if we consider of what kinde of men he speaketh. For he toucheth those builders of the Church, that keeping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that notwithstanding from the chiefe and necessarye articles of faith, do erie in points that be smaller and lesse perillous, mingling their own deuises with the word of God. Such I say, must suffer losse of their work, hauing their deuises destroyed. But themselues are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance and error is allowable before the Lorde, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore, whosoever haue defiled the golden sicaentle of Gods worde with this dung of purgatorie, they must needes suffer losse of their worke.

10 But they will say, it hath bene an ancient vsage of the Church. Paul answered this obiection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where he saith, that al they must suffer losse of their work, that in the building of the church, do lay any thing vpon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therefore when the aduerfaries obiect against me, that it hath bene vsed aboute a thousand and three hundred yeeres, to haue prayers made for the dead: I aske them againe, by what word of God, by what reuelation, by what example it was done. For heere they doe not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also all the examples of holy men that there are read, do they no such thing. Of the mourning and order of funerals there are somtimes found many and long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue bene expressly spoken. But the very old fathers themselues that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, and lawfull example. Why then durit they do so? In this I say, they did suffer somwhat as men: and therefore I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawn into exaple. For wheras the faithful

ought to enterprife the doing of nothing, but vpon assured conscience, as Paul teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in praier. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieue their sorrow: and it seemed vnatural all not to shew before God some testimony of their loue toward the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also the receiued custome was like a burning brand to set many mens mindes on fier. We know that with all nations and in all ages there were funerals done for the dead, and their soules yerely purged. For though Satan beguiled foolish men wih these deceits: yet he tooke occasion so to beguile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that euen very superstition condemneth the Gentiles before the iudgement seate of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselves to beleue. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were viterly destroyed. Hereupon came that ill aduised diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproch. And that which first proceeded from a wrongfull following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the principall holmess of Papistrie, to help the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministreth another much better and perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lord. And it addeth a reason: because from thenceforth they rest from their labors. And we ought not so much tenderly to follow our owne affection of loue, to set vp a wrongfull maner of praying in the Church. Truly he that hath but meane wisdom, doth soone perceiue that all that is read hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vsage, and the ignorance of the people. They themselves also, I grant, were carried away into error: euen as vnaduised lightnes of beleife is wont to rob mens wits of iudgement. But in the meane time the verie reading of the doct shew, how doubtfully they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that he might be remembered in celebrating the ministeries at the Altar. An old wifes request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doubtings, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heate of a foolish zeale: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truly with cold likelihoodes it will bring them out of care that were before carefull. For this is one pillar of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growen in vs, that the dead should be praied for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, that it is a charnable vs to help the dead: yet we must still hold one rule which cannot deceiue: that it is not lawfull for vs in our prayers, to vse any thing of our owne, but our requests must be made subiect to the word of God: because it is in his will to appoint what he will haue to be asked. Now where as the whole law and the Gospell do not so much as in one syllable giue libertie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inuocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they haue the ancient church companion of their error: I say there is great difference betweene them and it. They vsed a memorial of the dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse that they doubted of their state. As for purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing vncertaine. These men require to haue that which they haue dreamed of purgatorie, to be holden without question for an article of faith. They slenderly and onely to passe it lightly ouer, did in the communion of the holy supper commend their dead to God: These do continually call vpon the care of the dead, and with importunate praising it, doe make it to be preferred aboue all dutifull works of charitie. Yea, and it were not hard for vs to bring fourth some testimonies of the olde writers, that doe manifestly ouerthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were vsed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men looke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glorie, and that euery man then receiue the rest that followeth after death, if he be woorthie when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that all the godly doe immediately after death enioy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you shall our prayers auaille them? I passe ouer the grossier superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the mindes of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can haue no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthy buyings and sellings that they haue vsed, while the world was in such grosse senselesse ignorance. For both I should neuer make an end, and also the readers shall without any rehearfall of them, haue here sufficient, wherupon they may stablish their consciences.

The vj. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first, by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth vs therunto.

An order of framing our liues needefull to be gathered out of Scriptures.

WE haue already said, that the marke wherunto regeneration tendeth is that in the life of the faithfull there should appeere an agreement and consent betwene the righteousnesse of God and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his lawe containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of God is restored in vs, yet because our dullnesse hath neede both of many prickings forwarde and helpes, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of diuers places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that haue a desirous minde of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endeouour. Now when I take vpon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifolde and plentious argument, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fill a long volume, if I would absolutely treat of it in all pointes. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of old writers, made onely euery one of one seueral vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For whatsoeuer vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plentie of matter, that a man cannot seeme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse he haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teach, as peculiarly to goe through euery special vertue, and wander abro ad into exhortations. Let such things be fetched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homilies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shewe an orderly trade, wherby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine vniuersall rule, by which he may well tye what be his duties. There shall peradventure at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe. I doe naturally loue shortnesse, and peradventure if I would speake more at large, it would not frame wel with me. And if a longer maner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue mind to put it in proofe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Philosophers haue their certaine ends of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the company of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Philosophers orders. Thus onely is the difference, that that they (as they were vaine glorious men) haue diligently endeouored to attaine an exquisite plainenes of order, to shewe forth the ready aptnesse of their wit. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime vseth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly vpon two parts. The first, that there be powred and brought into our mindes a loue of righteousnes, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing enclined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousnes. In commendation of righteousnes it hath both verie many and verie good reasons: of which we haue here before in diuerse places spoken of some, and other some we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better begin, than when it putteth vs in mind that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sleepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth vs together againe, to ioine vs in one flocke with himselfe. When we heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holynesse must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleaue vnto him, that being endued with his holinesse, we may follow whither he calleth) but because it greatly pertaineth to his glorie, that he haue no fellowship with wickednesse and vncleanenesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought alway to haue respect vnto, if we will answer God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drizen out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if we giue our selues leaue all our life long to wallow in them still? Moreover it also admonisheth vs that to the end we may be reclined among the people of God, we must dwell in the holie cite Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himselfe, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholily prophaned by the vncleanenesse of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that they shall haue a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to follow righteousnes, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, should be like a stable full of filthinesse.

The first entrance vnto newnesse of life is the loue of holinesse, wherewith is enflamed vs we are taught that God is holie.

Psal. 35. 8. Psal. 15. 2. & 23.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would haue vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophic concerning maners, is in them only orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should liue agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true wellspring, when it not only teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whome it is bond: but also when he hath taught that we are swaued out of kinde from the true original and state of our creation, she immediately addeth, that Christ by whome we came againe into fauour with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man requir more effectual than this one thing? Yet, what may a man require more than this one thing? For if the Lord hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if we doe not giue and auow our selues to righteousnes, we doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creator, but also we forswear him to be our fauour. Then the scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of God, which she rehearseth vnto vs, and all the parts of our saluation. And sheweth that sith God hath shewed himselfe a father vnto vs, wee are worthe to be condemned of extreme vnthankfulnessse, if we do not likewise in our behalfe shew our selues children vnto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed vs with the washing of his blood, blood, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptisme, it is not seemely that we should be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath graffed vs into his body, we must carefully take heede that we sprinkle not any spot or blot vpon vs that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our head, is ascended into heauen, it behooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our hart aspire to heauenward: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must endeavour that Gods glorie may be honourably set out by vs, and must not doe any thing whereby we may be prophaned with filthinesse of sinne: Sith both our soule and our bodie are ordained to heauenly incorruption and an vnperishing crowne, we must diligently trauell, that the same may be kept pure and vncorrupted vnto the day of the Lord. These (I say) be the best laide foundations to build a mans life, and such as the like are not to be founde among the Philosphers, which in commendation of vertue doe neuer climbe aboute the naturall dignitie of man.

Another mooue vnto holines is Christ his holines which God hath set to be our pattern.

It is the imitation of Christ which declareth a true Christian.

Ephes. 4.

4 And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet would be named Christians. But with what face doe they boast of his holy name: sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue receiued a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Gospell? But the Apostle saith, that all they haue not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the olde man which is corrupted according to the desire of error, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is prooued that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretende the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundly talke of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learnings be, with onely vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it possesseth the whole soule, and findeth a seate and place to hold it in the most inward affection of the hart. Therefore either let them cease, to the slander of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shew themselues not vnwoorthie schollers for Christ their maister. We haue giuen the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is contained, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must be powred into our hart, and passe into our manners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philosphers doe iustly chafe against them, and doe with shamefull reproch driue them from their companie, that professing an arte that ought to be schoolemaisters of life, doe turne it into a Sophisticall babling: with how much better reason shall we detest these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell vpon the top of their tongues, the effectuall working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affections of the hart, to rest in the soule, and to alter the whoie man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortation of Philosphers?

Though Christians be far from attaining vnto, yet they ought to be earnest in following after the perfect righteousness which is set before them in the Gospell.

5 Yet doe I not require that the manners of a Christian man saouour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which neuertheless both were to be wished and we must endeavour vs toward it. But I doe not so severely require a gospellike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a christian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the Church, sith there is no man founde that is not by a great space distant from it, and many haue hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet should be vnjustly cast away. What then? let that be set for the marke before our eyes, to which alone all our endeour may be directed. Let that be appointed the goale for vs to run and trauell vnto. For it is not lawfull for thee to make partition with God, to take vpon thee part of these things that are commanded thee in his word, and to leaue part at thine owne chioise. For first of all he euerie where commendeth integritie as the cheefe part of worshipping him: by which word he meaneth a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faining: against which a double hart is set as contrarie: as if it should be faide, that the beginning of liuing vprightly is spirituall, when the inward affection of the mind is without fainting dedicate to God to obserue holincesse and righteousnesse. But because no man in this earthly prison of the bodie hath so great strength to hast with such freshnes of running, as he perfectly ought to do, and the greater number are so feeble, that with staggering and halting, yea and creeping vpon the ground, they advance but slowly forward. Let vs euenie one goe according to the measure of his litle power, and proceede on our iourney begun. No man shall go so vntowardly, but he shall euery day get some ground, though it be but litle. Therefore let vs not cease to trauell so, that we may continually proceede somewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not despair vpon the slendernes of our going forward, for how soeuer the successe answer not our desire, yet we haue not lost our labour when this day passeth yesterday: so that with pure simplicitie we looke vnto our marke, and long toward the end of our course, notwithstanding flattering our selues, nor tenderly bearing with our owne euils, but with continuall endeour traouling to this, that we may still become better than our selues, till we attaine to goodnes it selfe: which in deede we seeke for and follow all our life long: but we shall then only attaine it, when being vncliothed of the weakenes of the flesh, we shall be receiued into the full fellowship thereof.

The vij. Chapter.

The summe of a Christi.in life: wherein is intreated of the forsaking of our selues.

Albeit that the law of the Lord haue a most aptly wel disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it seemed good to the heauenly schoolemaster to instruct men yet with a more exact trade to the same rule that he had set forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the dutie of the faithfull to yeld their bodies to God a liuing, holy and acceptable sacrifice vnto him: and that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Hereupon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they do not apply themselves to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may proue what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we should from thence forth thinke, speake, imagine, or do nothing but to his glorie. For the thing that is consecrate, cannot be applied to vnholy vses, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appeareth what error is to be auoided, and wherunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the end for vs to tend vnto, to seeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selues and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs liue and die to him. We are Gods: therefore let his wisdom and will gouerne all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the parts of our life tend toward him as their only lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from himselfe the rule and government of himselfe to giue it to God? For as this is the most strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey themselves: so it is the onely haue of libertie, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but only to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first step, that man depart from himselfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not only that which standeth in obedience of the word, but that whereby the minde of man, void from his owne sensualitie of flesh, bendeth it selfe whole to the will of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) whereas it is the first entrie into life, all the Philo.sophers were ignorant.

The first beginning of a new life, is the resigning ouer of our selues from our selues vnto God.

ignorant. For they make onely Reason the gouernesse of man: they thinke she onely ought to be heard: finally to her onely they giue and assigne the rule of manners. But the Christian Philosophie biddeth her to giue place, and to yeeld and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man now may not liue himselfe, but beare Christ liuing and reigning in him.

The next degree of righteousness is to seeke those things that are of God sincerely for themselves not in any side respect of our owne.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that we seeke not the things that be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lorde, and that make to the advancement of his glory. This is also a prooffe of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our selues, and altogether leauing the regard of our selues, we trauell to employ our studie to God and his commandements. For when the Scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuie regard of our selues, it doth not onelie race out of our mindes the couetousnes of hauing the greede: seeking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glorie, and other more secret pestilences. Truly a Christian man must be so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this sort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and iudgement: so he shall reuerently direct vnto him all the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke vpon God in all things that he hath to doe, is therewithall turned away from all vaine thoughts. This is that forsaking of our selues, which Christ euen from their first beginning of instruction so earnestly gaue in charge to his disciples: which when it once hath gotten possession in the hart leaueth no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulness, nor vaine glorious boasting, then neither for couetise, nor filthy lust, nor riotousnes, nor deuitines, nor for other euils that are engendred of the loue of our selues. Contrariwise, where soeuer it reigneth not, there either most filthy vices do rage without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glorie. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he haue forsaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lorde, will of his owne free will vse goodnes among men. For all they that haue not been possessed with this feeling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at the least for praifes sake. And all the Philosophers that euer most of all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selfes sake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appeared that they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proud vpon. But God is so nothing at all delighted, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beastes, that he pronounceth that they haue already receiued their rewarde in the worlde, and maketh harlots and Publicanes neerer to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not throughly declared with how many and how great stops man is hindered from that which is right, so long as he hath not forsaken himselfe. For it was truly said in times past, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the soule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies bur denying thy selfe, and leauing regard of thy selfe, to bende thy minde to seeke those things that the Lorde requirith of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

Tit. 2. 12.

3 In another place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, goe through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth saluation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that we should denie all vngodlinesse, and worldly lustes, and that we should liue sober minded, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mightie God, and of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, which gaue himselfe for vs to redeeme vs from all vnrighteousnes, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himselfe feruently giuen vnto good works. For after that he hath set forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make ready the way for vs to worship God, he taketh awaie two stoppes that doe most hinder vs, that is to say, vngodlinesse, whereunto wee are naturally too much inclined, and Worldly desires, which extend further. And

vnder the name of vngodlinesse, he not onely meaneth superstitious, but also comprehendeth all that disagreeeth with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lustes are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore he commaundeth vs in respect of both the tables of the lawe, to put off our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life he bringeth into three partes, sobrietic, righteousnesse, and godlinesse: of the which sobrietic without doubt signifieth as well chastitie and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing vie of temporal things, and a patient sufferance of pouertie. Righteousnesse containeth all the duties of equitie, to giue euery man his owne. The third is Godlinesse, that seuereth vs from the defilings of the world, and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfection. But for as much as nothing is more hard, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to giue our selues to God and our brethren, and to studie for an Angellike life in the filthie state of the earth: therefore Paul, to loose our miudes from all snares, calleth vs backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to strue in vaine: because as Christ hath once appeared the redeemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the fruit of the saluation that he hath purchased. And thus he driueth away the entisements that blinde vs, and make vs not to aspire as we ought, to the heauenly glorie: yea and he teacheth that we must trauell as men being from home in this world, that the heauenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

4 Now in these words we perceiue, that the forsaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the Scripture biddeth vs so to behaue our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that we faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it giueth such commaundements as our minde is not able to receiue, but first being made voide of naturall sense. For (with such blindness we runne all into loue of our selues) euery man thinketh himselfe to haue a iust cause to aduaunce himselfe, and to despise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God haue giuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely swel, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good giftes, which we praise in our selues, or better doe appeere in other, least we should be compelled to giue place to them, we doe with our enuiousnesse deface them and finde fault with them. If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented severely and sharply to marke it, but we also odiously amplifie it. Hereupon groweth that insolencie, that euery one of vs, as though hee were priuiledged from the common estate, would be higher than the rest, and carelesly and proudly set light by euery man, or despise them as inferiours. The poore yeeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, seruants to their masters, vnlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So euery man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his brest. For presumptuously taking vpon them somewhat whereby to please themselves, they iudge vpon the wits and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there bursteth out their poyson. For many doe make a shewe of great meeknesse, so long as they finde all things gentle and lowly: but how many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when hee is pricked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedie hercof, but that the most hurtfull pestilence of loue, of soueraignie and selfeloue be rooted out of the botome of their harts, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that we must remember that the good giftes that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good things, but the free giftes of God, wherof if any be proud, they beuoy

The deuill of our selues hath relation partly to men but chiefly to God. Rom. 12. 20. Phil. 2. 3.

Cap.7. Of the maner how to receiue

their owne vnthankfulnesse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul saith, if thou hast receiued all things, why doest thou boast as if they were not giuen thee: Then, that we must with continuall reknowledging of our faultes, call our selues backe to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there shall be much matter to abase our selues. Againe, we are commanded, whatsoeuer giftes of God we see in other men, so to reuerence and esteeme those giftes, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it were a great lewdnesse for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchsafed to giue them. As for their faultes, we are taught to winke at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that we should not by reason of those faultes triumph against them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man soeuer we haue to doe, we shall behaue our selues not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendly. As a man shall neuer come any other way to true meekenesse, but if he haue a hart endued with abasing of himselfe, and reuerencing of other.

5 Now how hard is it, for thee to doe thy dutie in seeking the profite of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, vnlesse thou depart from regard of thy selfe, and in a maner put off thy selfe. For how canst thou performe these things that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnlesse thou forsake thy selfe, to giue thy selfe wholly to other? Charitie (saith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not disdainfull, enuie not, wellethe not, seeketh not her owne, is not angry, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seeke not the things that are our owne, we shall doe no smal violence to nature, which so bendeth vs to the onely loue of our selues, that it doth not easily suffer vs negligently to passe ouer our selues and our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to another. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hand, warneth vs that whatsoeuer gracious giftes wee obtaine of the Lorde, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they should be bestowed to the common benefite of the Church: and that therefore the true vse of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuised for the keeping of the same, than when we be taught that all the good giftes that we haue, are things of God deliuered, committed to our trust vpon this condition, that they should be disposed to the benefite of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers where-with the members of mans body are endued. No member hath his power for himselfe, nor applieth it to his priuate vse: but powreth it abroad into the other members of the same bodie, and taketh no profite thereof, but such as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatsoeuer a godly man is able to doe, he ought to be able to doe it for his brethren, in providing none otherwise priuately for himselfe, but so that his mind be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoeuer God hath bestowed vpon vs, whereby we may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailifes thereof, and bound to render account of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So shall it come to passe, that we shall alway not only ioyne the trauell for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that we should not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the giftes that we receiue of God, he hath in the old time set the same lawe euen in the smallest grtes of his liberalitie. For he commanded the first fruits of corne to be offered vnto him, by which the people might testify that it was vnlawfull for them to take any fruit of the goodes that were not first consecrate to him. If the giftes of God be onely then sanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our owne hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is euident that it is an vntrue abuse thereof that doth not fauour of such dedication. But it shall bee vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lorde with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore sith thy liberalitie cannot extend vnto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must vse it towarde his Saintes that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may now be correspondent to these of the law.

6 But that we should not be wearie with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adioyned which the Apostle speaketh of; that charitie is patient & not moued to anger. The Lord commandeth to do good to all vnierfully, of whom a great part are most vnwoorthie, if they be considered by their owne deserting. But heere the Scripture helpeth with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we must not haue respect what men deserue of themselves, but that the image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honor and loue. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the household of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed and restored by the spirite of Christ. Therefore whatsoever man thou light vpon, that needeth thy helpe, thou hast no cause to withdraw thy selfe from doing him good. If thou say that he is a stranger: but the Lorde hath giuen him a marke, that ought to be familiar vnto thee, by the reason that hee forbiddeth thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou saie that hee is base and naught woorth: but the Lorde sheweth him to be such a one, to whom he hath vouchsafed to giue the beauty of his image. If thou say that thou owest him nothing for anie thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whom, thou knowest so many & so great benefits wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou saie that hee is vnwoorthie that thou shouldst labour any thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended vnto thee, is worthy that thou shouldst giue thy selfe and all that thou hast vnto it. But if hee haue not onely deserued no good at thy hande, but also prouoked thee with wrongs and euill doings: euen this is no iust cause why thou shouldst cease both to loue him & to do for him the dutifull workes of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise deserued of me. But what hath the Lorde deserued? Which when hee commandeth thee to forgiue al wherin he hath offended thee, truly he willet the same to be imputed to himselfe. Truly this is that only way to com to that which is vtterly against the nature of man, much more is it hard for man, I meane, to loue them that hate vs, to recompence euill with doing good, to render blessings for reproches: if we remember that we must not consider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their fautes, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to embrace it.

7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when wee performe the duties of charitie. But it is not hee that performeth them, that onlie doth all the dutifull workes of charitie, although he leaue none of them vndone, but he doth them of a syncre affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to all men all that he oweth, so much as concerned outward duties: and yet he may be farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that would seeme verie liberall, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnes of wordes they vpbraide it. And we be come to such wretchednesse in this unhappie world, that almost no almes are giuen of any men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproching. Which peruersenesse shoulde not haue bene tollerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required then to shew a cheerefulnesse in countenance, and make their doings louely with gentlenes of wordes. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whom they seee to neede their helpe, and then so pittie their case, as if themselves did feele and suffer it: so that they may be carried with feeling of mercie and gentlenes, euen as they would be to helpe themselves. He that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, will not onely not defile his dooings with any arrogancie or vbraiding but alio neither will despise his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his helpe, nor treade him vnder foote as one bound vnto him: no more than we vse to reproch a sicke member, for easing whereof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it specially bound to the other members, because it hath drawn more helpe vnto it than it hath recompented. For it is thought that the common interpreting of duties between members of one bodie, hath no free kind of gift, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the law of nature it were monstrous to denie. And by this reason it shall follow, that he may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of duetie, as it is commonly vsed, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, he leaue other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euerie man shall thinke thus with himselfe, that he is altogether debter to his neighbours; and that he must determine none other end of vsing his liberalitie, but when aibilitie fayleth, which how large soeuer it be, must be measured by the rule of charitie.

8 Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall part of forsaking our selues, which wee saide to haue respect to God. Wee haue saide much of it already, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall be sufficient to entreat of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and sufferance. First therefore in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lords wil, we would yeeld vnto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To couet wealth and honors, to compassie authoritie, to heape vp riches, to gather together all such follies as serue for ioyalitie and pompe, our lust is outrageous, and our greedinesse infinite. On the other side of pouertie, ignobilitie, and base estate, we haue a marvellous feare and marvellous hatred, that moue vs to trauell by all meanes to escape them. Hereby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they haue, how many shaftes they attempt, with what studies they wearie their life, that frame their life after their owne deuote: to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or couetousnesse requirerth, and on the other side to escape pouerty and basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselues vpon it. For howsoeuer the flesh thinke it selfe sufficient of her selfe, when she either trauelleth by her owne diligence, or endeouereth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the fauour of men, to the attayning of honour and wealth: yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, and that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauell; but in so much as the Lord shall prosper both. But on the other side his onely blessing findeth a way through all stops, to make all things proceede with vs to a ioyfull and luckie end. Then howsoeuer we may get of all obtaine any glorie or wealth without it (as we dayly see the wicked to get heaps of great honors & riches) yet forasmuch as they vpon whom resteth the curse, do feele no part of felicitie, wee can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to euil. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

9 Therefore if we beleue that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kinds of miserie and calamitie must happen vnto vs: this remaineth alio, that we doe not greedily endeouour to wealth and honors standing vpon our owne conceit of wit or diligence, nor leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that we alway looke vnto the Lord, to be lead by his guiding to whatsoever lot he hath provided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and inuading of honours, by wrongs, by guile and craft craftie meanes, or extortion with doing iniurie to our neighbours, but shall onelie follow those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other fittle meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doth rightlie, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt dooings. Then we shall be bridled that we burne not with vnmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honors. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that he desireth against his word? For God forbid that God should giue the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succede not according to our wish & hope, yet we shall be restrained frō impatience, and frō cursing our estate whatsoever it be: because we know that that is to murmure against God, at whose will richesse and pouertie, basenesse and honors are disposed. Briefly, he that reflecteth himselfe in such sort as is aforesaid vpon the blessing of God, neither will by euill fittleties hunt for those things that men are wont outrageously to couet, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endeuour, or to fortune, but will assigne it to God the Author. But if while other mens estates doe flourish, he goe but slenderlie forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will beare his ill fortune with greater quietnesse and moderation of minde, than a prophane man will beare a meanely good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired: because he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than vpon the highest top of wealth and authoritie: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is available for his saluation. So we see that Dauid was minded, and yeeldeth himselfe to be ruled by God, he declareth himselfe to be like to a weined child, and that he walketh not in high things or maruellous aboue himselfe.

Psal. 137.

10 And the godly munes ought to haue that quietnesse and sustenance not onely consisting in this behalfe: but also it must extend to all chaunces whereunto our present life is subiect. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath foresigned himselfe vp wholly to the Lord, that he suffereth all the partes of his life to be gouerned by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoever happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enuiousnesse against God complaine of his fortune. How necessarie this affection is, shall hereby appeare, if you consider to how many chaunces we be subiect. Diuerse kindes of diseases doe trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime we are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile deuouring the hope of the yeare, bringeth barrennesse, that driueth vs to dearth: sometime our wife, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these be the things at chauncing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue Heauen and Light in execration, murmure against God, and (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vniustice and cruelty. But a faithfull man must euen in these chaunces behold the mercifull kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore cease to praise God, but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leaue it desolate. Or if when his corne is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten down with haile, he see famine at hand, yet he will not despaire, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, We are yet in the Lords protection, and thecp brought vp in his pastures: hee therefore will finde vs foode euen in exactest barrennesse. Or if he be troubled with sicknesse, euen then he will not bee discouraged with bitternesse of sorrowe to bust out into impatience and quarrell thus with God: but considering the righteousnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he will call himselfe backe to patience. Finally whatsoeuer shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, he will take it with a well pleased and thankfull minde, least he should stubbornly resist his authoritic, into whose power he hath yeilded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against aduersities, did impure the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angrie, because she was blinde and vnaduised, that blindly wounded both the deseruing and vnderdeseruing. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlines, that the only hand of God is the iudge and gouernesse of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forward with vnaduised sudden rage, but with most orderly iustice dealeth among vs both good things and euill.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the bearing of the crosse, which is a part of the forsaking of our selues.

He which forsaketh himselfe must arme himselfe to indure a trauelsome estate of life, wherein there is no wish/standing this comfort, we go no other way than Christ himselfe hath troden before us.
Mar. 16. 24.
Matt. 3. 17.
& 17. 5.

BVt a godly minde must yet climbe vp higher, euen to that whereunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lord hath chosen & vouchsafed to receiue into his company, must prepare themselves to a hard, trauelsome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diuers kinds of incommodities. So it is the wil of the heavenly father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may haue a true prooue of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloued sonne aboue the rest, and in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and daintily handled: so that it may be truly said, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kind of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behooued that he should learne obedience by those things that he suffered. Why then should we priuledge our selues from that estate, whereunto it behooued Christ our head to be subiect, specially sith he became subiect therunto for our cause, to shew vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle saith that this is the appointed ende of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard and sharp chaunces, which are reckoned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the sufferings of Christ: that as he entered out of a maze of all troubles into the heavenly glory, so we may by diuers tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so saith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we do also conceiue the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowship of his glorious rising againe. How much may this auail to assuage all the painefulnes of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our fellowship with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferings are not onely made blessed vnto vs, but also do much helpe vs to the furtherance of our saluation.

Rom. 8. 2.

AQ. 14. 12.
Philip. 3. 10.

Affliction necessarie for vs not onely as for Christ to rellise our obedience vnto God, but farther also to bring vs to a sensible feeling of our owne vniculnes and weakenesse.

2 Beside that, our Lord had no neede to take vpon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie and prouue his obedience to his father: but wee for diuers causes haue neede to lead our life vnder a continuall crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh) vnlesse our weakenes be shewed vs as it were before our eyes, we do easily esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure, and doubt not that whatsoeuer happen, it will continue vnbroken and vnouercome against all hard assaults. Whereby we are carried into a foolish and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting therupon we stubbornly waxe proud against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate beate downe, than when he proueth vnto vs by experience, not onely how feeble, but also how traile we be. Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouertie, or losse of children, or sickenes, or other calamities, which we being vnable to beare in respect of our selues, doe by and by sinke downe vnder them. Being so humbled we learne to call vpon his strength, which onely maketh vs to stand vpriight vnder the heaue burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well fouer they know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancie, vnlesse by the trial of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselues. The stouthnes crept into David: Psal. 30. 8. I said in my rest, I shall neuer be mooued, Lord, thou hadst stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was striken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnes in prosperitie his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, vpon which he should haue hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetuall continuance. If this chaunced to so great a Prophet: which of vs ought not to be fearefull, that we may be heedfull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancie and patience, when they are once humbled with aduersitie, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, doe thereby profit to humilitate, that being vn clothed of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may resort to the grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience prooffe. For whereas God hath promised the faithfull that he will be present with them in troubles, they feele the same to be true, when they stand patiently being vpholden by his hand, which by their owne strength they were not able to do. Parience therefore bringeth a prooffe by experience to the holy ones, that God when need requireth, will indeede performe the helpe that he hath promised. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience proued to be constant and sure. We see now how many good things doe come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse. For overthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume of our owne strength, and disclosing our hypocrisie that delighteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God onely, by which it commeth to passe, that we neither be oppressed nor fall downe. And after victorie followeth hope, insomuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promised, stablisheth the credite of his truth for time to come. Truly, although there were no moe reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of the crosse is necessarie for vs. For it is a matter of no small importance, to haue the blinde loue of thy selfe wiped away, that thou maist well know thine own weakenes. To feele thine owne weakenes, that thou maist learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou maist remoue thy confidence from thy selfe vnto God, to rest with confidence of hart vpon God, that being vpholden by his helpe, thou maist continue vnouercome to the last end: to stand fast by his grace, that thou maist vnderstand that he is true in his promises: to know by prooffe the truth of his promises, that thy hope may be strengthened thereby.

4 The Lord hath also an other end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience toward him, other than the same that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approoued by witnesses, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open thew the strength of sufferance and constancie, wherewith he hath Affliction by teaching vs how feeble we are of our selues, causeth vs to rest onely vpon God. Thv breedeth patience, whereby experience groweth of Gods vpholding them that rely vpo him, which striall of his goodnes in things past, stablisheth the credite of his truth for shinges to come, and increaseth hope.

Rom. 5. 3.

By affliction God bringeth forth the virtues of his Saints, which before lay hid, into open shew, and also traineth them in true obedience, furnished his seruants, it is saide that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempted Abraham, and had prooffe of his godlinesse, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his owne and onely sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proued in troubles, as gold is tried in a fornaice. And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithfull man hath receiued of his God, should be brought forth into vse, that it may be made certainly knowen and manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthe. Now if God himselfe doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stir vp the vertues that he hath giuen to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea he vnprofitable and perish: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their patience should be nothing. I say also that by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne will, but after the will of God. Truly if all things should flow vnto them after their owne mind, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an old Prouerbe, when they exhorted any man to suffer aduersities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only man truly entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yeilded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Now if it be most righteous, that we should shew our selues in all things obedient to the heauenly father, then we ought not to refuse, that he should by all means accustom vs to yeeld obedience vnto him.

cap.15.

*The flesh stubborn, rebellious & wanton
without saving.*

5 But yet we perceiue not how necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we do also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God, so soone as it hath bene but a little while daintily and tenderly handled. The same happeneth vnto it, that chaunceth to stubborne horses, which if they be a fewe daies pampered idly, they cannot afterward for fearenesse bee tamed, neither doe know the rider, to whose gouernement they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to haue been in the people of Israell, that being well fed and couered with fatnesse, we kicke against him that fed and nourished vs. The liberality of God should indeed haue allured vs to consider and loue his goodnes, but for as much as our euill nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender vsage, it is more than necessarie for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we run not outrageously into such a stubborne wantonnesse. So that we should not growe fierce with vnnaturable abundance of riches, that we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that we should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune, the Lord himselfe, as he foreseeeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it, and with the remedie of the crosse suddueth and bridleth the fiercenes of our flesh, and that diuers waies, so much as is healthfull for euerie man. For all are not alike sicke of all one diseases, or do alike need of hard healing. And thereupon is to be seene how some are exercised with one kinde of crosse, and some with another. But whereas the heauenly Phisition handleth some more gently, and purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to prouide for the health of all: yet he leaueh none sicke or vntouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

Deut.33.15.

Affliction needfull for vs in respect of our offences past.

6 Moreouer, the most mercifull father needeth not onely to preuent our weaknesses, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to enter into our mind: so without doubt we shall finde that we haue done somewhat worthy of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience vpon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministreth vs a farre better consideration, when it saith, that the Lord correcteth vs with aduersities, that wee should not bee damned with this world. Therefore we ought euen in the verie sharpnes of tribulations to acknowledge the kindnes & goodnes of our father toward vs, forasmuch as cuē then he

ceaseth not to further our saluation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliuer vs from the damnation of the worlde. That thought shall lead vs to that, which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lordes correction, nor be weary when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, and embraceth him as a father doth his childe. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our dutie rather to shew our selues obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardened with euill dooings? The Lord leaseth vs, vnlesse he call vs backe by correction when we are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes rightly saith that we are bastards, and not children if we be out of correction. Therefore we are most froward, if we cannot suffer him when he declareth his good wil and the care that he hath for our saluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene the vnbeleuers and the faithfull, that the vnbeleuers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardened wickednes, are made the worse and more obstinate with whipping: the faithfull, like children hauing an honest freedome of nature, do thereby profite to repentance. Nowe must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in another place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an end.

Pro. 3. 11.

Heb. 12. 8.

7 Moreouer it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteoufnes. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchsafeth to grant vs, that he so garnisheth vs with the peculiar marke of his souldiers. I meane that they suffer perfection for righteoufnes, not onely that suffer for defense of the Gospell, but also that are troubled for any defense of righteoufnes. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Satan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocents against the wrongs of the wicked, we be driuen to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the worlde, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in danger: let it not be greuous or loathsome vnto vs to employ our selues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in these things in which hee hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Pouertie indeed, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: Finally, death is the vtermost of all calamities. But when the fauor of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicitie. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimonie of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall reioyce as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs woorthie to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues cleere in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are indeede brought to pouertie thereby among men, but so riches truly grow do vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the household of God. If we be vexed and despised, we take so much the deeper roores in Christ. If we be noted with reproches and shame, we are in so much the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If we be slaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs be ashamed to esteem lesse these things, vpon which the Lord hath set so great a price, than shadowish and sickle enticing pleasures of present life.

When the cause of our suffering is righteoufnes it is not a crosse but a gaine to suffer.

Matt. 5. 10.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these and like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defense of righteoufnesse, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly and cheerefully receiue them at the Lords hand, specially sith this is the kinde of crosse, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more greuous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul exprefly admonisheth that we shall not onely suffer persecutions, but also reproches because wee trust in the liuing God. As in another place hee teacheth vs after his example to walke through sleaude and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheerefulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitternes and sorrow, or else the patience of the holie ones in the croffe were no patience, vntil they should be both tormented with sorrow and vexed with griefe. If there were no hardnes in poerty, no paine in sicknes, no grieue in shame, no horour in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to beare them indifferently? But when euery one of these doth with the naturall bitternes thereof bite the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithfull man shew it selfe, if being assaied with the feeling of such bitternes, how grievously he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting he ouercommeth it, his patience vttereth it selfe herein, if being sharply prouoked, he is yet so bridled with the feare of God, that he bursteth not out into any distemper. His cheerefulnes appeareth herein, if being wounded with sadnes and sorrow, he resteth vpon the spirituall comfort of God.

2. Cor. 4. 8.

9 This conflict, which the faithfull do sustaine against the naturall feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience and temperance, Paul hath verie well described in these words. We are put to distresse in all things, but we are not made forowfull: we labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer persecution, but we are not forsaken in it: we are throwen downe, but we perish not. You see how to beare the croffe patiently, is not to be altogether astonished, and without all feeling of sorrow: as the Stoikes in old time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such a one, as putting off all nature of man, was alike moued in prosperity and in aduersitie, in sorowfull and ioyfull state, yea such a one as like a stone was moued with nothing: and what haue they profited with this high wisdom? Forsooth they haue painted out such an image of wisdom as neuer was found, and neuer can hereafter be among men: But rather while they coueted to haue too exact and precise a patience, they haue taken away all the vse of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among Christians there are new Stoicks, that reckon it a fault not only to grone and weepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions do commonly proceed from idle men, which busying themselues rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but breede vs such new found doctrines. But we haue nothing to do with that stony Philosophie, which our maister and Lord hath condemned not only by his word but also by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens aduersities. The world (saith he) shall reioyce, but you shall mourne and weepe. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no maruell. For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we iudge of the Lord himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody teares? If euery feare be noted of infidelity, what shall we iudge of that quaking feare, wherewith we read that he was not slenderly stricken? If all sadnes be mistaked, how shall we like this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad euen to the death?

The contrarie affections which are in godly afflicted mindes.

10 This I thought good to speake to this end, to call godly minds from despair, that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not put off the naturall affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a senselesse dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a flock. For the Scripture giueth to the holie ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of aduersities, that yet they be not overcome nor throwen downe with it: when they be so pricked with bitternes, that they be also delighted with spirituall ioy: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancie abideth still in their hearts, that naturall sense of schueth and dreadeth those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affliction of godlinesse trauaileth euen through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnancie the Lord expressed when he said thus to Peter: When thou wast yong thou didst grudge thy selfe

selfe and didst walke whither thou wouldest : But when thou art old, another shall gird thee and leade thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn unwillingly and resisting vnto it. Else his martyrdome should haue but small praise. But howsoeuer he did with great cheerefulness of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being stricken with horror thereof, he would gladly haue escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and treading downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerefully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must indeuour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reuerence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinaunce all contrarie affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoeuer kind of crosse we be vexed, euen in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For aduersities shall haue their sharpnes, wherewith we shalbe bitten: so when we are afflicted with sicknes, we shall both grone and be disquieted and desire health: so being pressed with pouerty, we shalbe pricked with the stings of carefullnesse and sorrow: so shall we be stricken with griefe of shame, contempt and iniury: so shall we yeeld due teares to nature at the buriall of our friends: but this alway shalbe the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his will. Yea euen in the midst of the prickings of sorrow, in the midst of mourning and teares this thought must needes come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerefully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moued.

11 But forasmuch as we haue taken the chiefe cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in few words define what difference is betweene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Truly very few of the Philosophers climbed to so high a reason, to vnderstand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, and to thinke that God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeeld vnto God, because thou shalt trauaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessity: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first iustice and equity, then the care of our saluation. These therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether pouerty, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sicknesse, or losse of parents, or childre, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these things doeth happen, but by the will and prouidence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most iust order: For why? do not our innumerable and daily offences deserue to be chastised more sharplie: and with more grieuous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God laieth vpon vs? Is it not most great equite, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that she do not wantonly growe wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and truth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an vndoubted righteousness in our afflictions, we cannot without vniighteousnes either murmur or wrastle against it. We heare not now that cold song: We must giue place, because we so must of necessitie, but we heare a liuely lesson and full of effectualnes, We must obey, because it is vnlawfull to resist: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnes against the righteousness of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthy to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our safety & benefite; the good father doth this way also comfort vs, when he affirmeth that euen in this that he afflicteth vs with the crosse, he prouideth for our safety. But if it be certain that troubles are healthful for vs, why should we not receiue them with a thankfull and wel pleased munde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we do not forcibly yeeld to necessitie, but quietly agree to our owne benefite. These thoughts (I say) doe make that how much our minds are greued in the crosse with natural feeling of bitterneffe, so much they be cheered with spirituall gladnesse. Whereupon also followeth thanksgiuing, which cannot be without ioy. But if the praise of the Lord and thanksgiuing proceedeth of nothing but of a cheerefull and ioyful hart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praising of God and thanksgiuing in vs: hereby appeereth how necessarie it is that the bitterneffe of the crosse be tempered with spirituall ioy.

The ix. Chapter.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

The miseries of this life must teach us not to seeke our felicities here.

BUT with whatsoever kinde of trouble we be distressed, wee must alway looke to this ende, to vse our selues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well how much we be by nature inclined to the beastly loue of this world, he vseth a most fit meane to draw vs backe, and to shake off our sluggishnesse, that we should not sticke too fast in that loue. There is none of vs that desireth not to seeme to aspire and endeavour all their life long to heavenly immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excell brute beastes in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferiour to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doings of euery man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that senselesnesse, that our minde being daseled with vaine glistering of riches, power and honours, is so dulle that it cannot see farre. Our hart also being possessed with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weighed downe, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with entisements of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lorde to remedie this euill, doth with continuall examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore that they should not promise themselues in this life a founde and quiet peace, he suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vprores, or robberies, or other iniuries. That they should not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitorie riches, or rest in the riches that they already possess, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to pouertie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefites of Marriage, he either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnesse of their wiues, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these things he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glorie, or immeasurably reioice with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases and dangers set before their eyes, how vnstable, and vanishing be all the goodes that are subiect to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublesome and innumerable waies miserable, and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckoned the good things thereof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with many euils mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be sought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleue. That our minde is neuer truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it haue first conueined a contempt of this present life.

2 For betwene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile vile in our sight, or hold vs bound with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternitie, we must diligently indeuour to loose our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasantnesse, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much behouefull for vs to be now and then called away, that we be not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done, if we did here enioy a continuall concourse of good things and felicitie, sith we cannot with continuall spurres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not only the learned do know, but also the common people haue no Prouerbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or thadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing verie profitable to be knowne, they haue set it out with many notable sentences. But there is nothing that we do either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all things, as though we would frame to our selues an immortalitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall, or if we walke among graues, then, because there is an image of death before our eyes, I graunt we do maruellously well discourse like Philosphers vpon the vanitie of this life. Albeit we do not that continually, for many times all these things do nothing moue vs. But when it happeneth our Philosphie lasteth but a while, which so soone as we turne our backs, vanisheth away, and leaueth no step at all of remembrance behind it: finally, it passeth away as clapping of hands vpon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also that we be subiect to death, as though we had neuer heard any report thereof, fall to a carelesse assurednes of earthly immortalitie. If anie man in the meane time tell vs of the Prouerbe, that man is a creature of a daies continuance, we graunt it indeede: but so heedlesly, that still the thought of euerlasting continuance resteth in our mind. Who therefore can denie, that it is a great profite to vs all, not onely to be admonished in words, but by all the examples of experience that may be, to be conuinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as euen when we are conuinced, we scarcely cease to stand amazed with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the vttermost end of good things. But if it be necessary that God instruct vs, it is our ducie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth and awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the world we may with all our hearts endeuour to the meditation of the life to come.

3 But let the faithfull accustome themselues to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not slender blessings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefite of God in it, we are guiltie of no small vnthankfulness toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithfull a testimonie of Gods good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their saluation. For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternall glory, his will is to shew himselfe a Father vnto vs by smaller examples: and these be the benefites that are daily bestowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life serueth vs to vnderstand the goodnes of God, shall we disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodnes in it? We must therefore put on this feeling and affection, to reckon it among the gifts of goodnes that are not to be refused. For though there wanted testimonies of scripture, of which there are both many most euident, very nature it selfe doth exhort vs to giue thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, that he granteth vs the vse of it, that he giueth vs all necessarie succours for the preseruacion of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine manner prepared to the glorie of the heauenly kingdome. For so the Lord hath ordained that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heauen, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they should not triumph, till they had overcome the hard adventures of the battell, and obtayned

the victorie. Then an other reason is, that we doe by diuerse benefites begin therein to taste the sweetnes of Gods liberalitie, that our hope and desire should be whetted too long for the reuiling thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we liue this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, so we ought to be mindefull and thankfull: then we shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate thereof, to this ende that we may be deliuered from too much greedinesse of it, whereunto as I haue before saide, wee are of our selues naturally enclined.

4 Now whatsoeuer is taken from the wrongfull desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt indeede that they thought truly, that thought it best not to be borne, and the next, to die quickly. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vnhappie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friendes, and solemnly reioyced at their burials, but they did it without profite, because being without the right doctrine of Faith, they did not see how that may turne to good to the godly, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their iudgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in iudging of mortall life, that when they vnderstand it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may resort wholly the more freshly and readilie to the eternall life to come. When we come to this comparison, then this present life may not onely be safely neglected, but also vterly despised and lothed in comparison of the other. For if Heauen be our Countrie, what is the earth else but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an enting into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to be drowned in death? If to be deliuered from the body is to be set in perfect libertie, what is the body else but a pison? If to enjoy the presence of God is the highest summe of felicitie, is it not miserable to lacke it? But till we be escaped out of the world, we wander abroad from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heauenly life, doubtles it ought to be despised and troden vnder foote. But it is neuer to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subiection to sin, and yet that hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must be so mouued either with wearines or hatred of it, that desiring the end of it, we may be also ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, so that our wearines may be far from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he call vs away. Paul indeed lamenteth his state that he is holden bound in the bonds of the bodie longer than he wished, and sighed with feruent desire of his redemption: neuertheless to obey the Commandement of the Lord, he professed himselfe readie to both, because he acknowledgedgeth himselfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glory. Therefore if we must liue and die to the Lord, let vs leaue to his will the time of our life and death, but so that we be still feruent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despise this life in comparison of the immortalitie to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lord because of the bondage of sinne.

5 But this is monstrous, that in steede of that desire of death, many that boast themselves to be Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at euery mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckily and vnhappie. Truly it is no maruell, if naturall sense in vs doe quake for feare when we heare of the dissoluing of vs. But this is in no wise tollerable, that there be not in a Christian mans breast the light of godlinesse, that should with greater comfort overcome and suppress that feare, how great soeuer it bee. For if we consider that this vntedfast, faultie, corruptible, fraile, withering, and rotten tabernacle of our body, is therefore dissolued, that it may afterward afterwarde be restored againe into a stedfast, perfect, vncorruptible and heavenly glorie: shall not faith compell vs ferently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabit our countrie, as a heavenly countrie, shall we obtaine no comfort thereby? but there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that we ought to looke vnto the immortalitye to come, where we may attaine a stedfast state that no where appeereth in earth. For Paul doth very well teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cheerefully to death: not because they woulde bee vnclouted, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shall brute beastes, yea and lueleffe creatures, euen stockes and stones, knowing their present vanitie, be earnestly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrection, that they may with the children of God be deliuered from vanitie, and shall we that are endued with the light of wit, and aboue wit enlightened with the spirite of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our mindes beyonde this rottensse of earth? But it pertauneth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake against this peruersenesse. And in the beginning I haue already professed, that I woulde not here take vpon me the large handling of common places. I woulde counsell such fearefull mindes to reade Cyprians booke of mortalitye, vnlesse they were meete to be sent to the Philosophers, that they may begin to be ashamed when they see the contempt of death that those doe shewe. But this let vs holde for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christ his schoole, but he that doth toyfully looke for the day both of death and of the last resurrection. For both Paul describeth all the faithfull by this marke, and also it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will set foorth a ground of perfect gladnesse. Reioice (saith the Lord) and lift vp your heads, for your redemption commeth neere at hand. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of so great force to raise vp ioy and cheerefulness in vs, should breede nothing but sorrow and discouragement? If it be so, why doe wee still boast of him as of our schoolemaster? Let vs therefore get a sounder minde, and howsoeuer the blinde and senselesse desire of the flesh do striue against it, let vs not doubt to wish for the coming of the Lord, not onely with wishing, but also with groning & sighing, as a thing most happie of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to vs, to drawe vs out of the infinite gulfe of euils and miseries, and to lead vs into that blessed inheritance of his life and glorie.

Luk. 22. 18.

6 This is certainly true: all the nations of the faithfull, so long as they dwell in earth, must be as sheepe appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnlesse they had their mind raised vp into heauen, and surmounted all that is in the worlde, and passed ouer the present face of things. Contrariwise when they haue once lifted their heads aboue all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying quiet peace, if they see them proud in gorgiounes and sumptuousnes of all things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delights, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednes, if they sustaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their couerousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will easilie vpholde themselves in such aduersities. For that day shall before their eyes, when the Lord shall receiue his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdome, when he shall wipe all teares from their eyes, when he shall cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladnes, when he shall feed them with the vnspeakable sweetenes of his deinties, when he shall aduance them to the fellowship of his high estate: finally when he shall vouchsafe to interparten his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that haue flourished in the earth, hee shall throwe into extreme shame, he shall change their delights into torments, their laughing and myrth into weeping and gnashing of teeth, he shall disquiet their peace with terrible torments of conscience,

Wee cannot but be troubled in minde till wee turne our eyes from beholding the present face of things that are, vnto the consideration of that which is to come, conſcience, he ſhall puniſh their deintines with vnquenchable fire, and ſhall put their heads in ſubiectiō to thoſe godly men, whoſe patience they haue abuſed. For this is righteousnes (as Paul teſtifieth) to giue releaſe to the miſerable and to them that are vniuſtly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe afflict the godly, when the Lord Ieſus ſhal be reuealed from heauen. This truly is our onely comfort, which if it be taken away, we muſt of neceſſitie either deſpaire, or flatteringly delight our ſelues with the vaine comforts of the world to our own deſtruction. For euen the Prophet confeſſeth that his feet ſtaggered, when he taried too long vpon conſidering the preſent proſperitie of the wicked: and that he could not otherwiſe ſtand ſtedfaſt, but when he entred into the ſanctuarie of God, and bended his eyes to the laſt end of the godly and the wicked. To conclude in one word then onely the croſſe of Chriſt triumpheth in the hearts of the faithfull vpon the Diuell, fleſh, ſinne, and the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the reſurrection.

The x. Chapter.

How we ought to vſe this preſent life, and the helpes thereof.

The vſe of things which ſerue for this preſent life is neither ſo ſtriect as ſome, nor ſo looſe as others haue imagined.

BY ſuch introductions the Scripture doth alſo well inſorme vs what is the right vſe of earthly benefits: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we muſt liue we muſt alſo vſe the neceſſarie helpes of life: neither can we eſchew euen thoſe things that ſeeme rather to ſerue for delight then for neceſſitie. Therefore we muſt keep a meature that we may vſe them with a pure conſcience, either for neceſſitie or for delight. That meature the Lord appointeth by his worde, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine iourney through a ſtrange country, by which they trauell toward the kingdome of heauen. If we muſt but paſſe through the earth, doubtleſſe we ought ſo farre to vſe the good things of the earth, as they may rather further then hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doth not vnprofitable counſell vs ſo to vſe this world, as though we vſed it not: and to buy poſſeſſions with ſuch a minde as they vſe to be ſolde. But becauſe this place is ſlipperie, and ſo flope on both ſides, that it quickly maketh vs to fall, let vs labour to faſten our foote there, where we may ſtand ſafely. For there haue bene ſome, that otherwiſe were good & holy men, which when they ſaw intemperance & ryot continually to range with vnbrideled luſt, vnleſſe it be ſharply reſtrained, and were deſirous to correct ſo great a miſchiefe, they could finde none other way, but ſuffered man to vſe the benefits of the earth, ſo farre as neceſſitie required. This was indeed a godly counſell, but they were too ſeuere. For (which is a vetic perillous thing) they did put ſtreter bonds vpon conſciences, than thoſe wherewith they were bounde by the worde of God. And they expound neceſſitie, to abſtaine from all things that a man may bee without. And ſo by their opinion, a man might ſcarcely take any more foode than breade and water. And ſome be yet more ſeuere: as it is read of Crates the Thebane, that did throw his goods into the ſea, becauſe if they were not deſtroied, he thought that he ſhould be deſtroied by them. Many at this day, while they ſeek a pretence whereby the intemperance of the fleſh in vſe of outward things may be excuſed, and while they go about to prepare a way for the fleſh raging in wantonnes, do take that as a thing confeſſed, which I do not grant them, that this libertie is not to be reſtrained with any limitation of meature, but that it is to bee left to cuerie mans conſcience to vſe as much as he ſeeth to be lawfull for him. Truly I conſiſte that conſciences neither ought nor can in this point be bounde by certaine and precise formes of lawes. But for ſmuch as the Scripture teacheth generall rules of lawfull vſe, we muſt ſurely meature the vſe according to theſe rules.

God hauing made things not onely for neceſſitie

2 Let this bee a principle: that the vſe of Gods gifts ſhaueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the author himſelfe hath created and and appointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than he that shall diligently looke vnto this end. Now if we consider to what end he hath created meates, we shall finde that he meant to make prouision not onely for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie hee appointed another ende, which is comelincesse and honestie. In herbes, trees, and fruites, beside diuers profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetenesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefites of God that wine maketh glad the hart of man, and that oile maketh his face to shine, the Scripture would not eachwhere, to set foorth his liberalitie, rehearse that hee hath giuen all such things to men. And the very naturall qualitie of things doe sufficiently shewe, to what ende and how farre we may vse them. Shall the Lord haue set in flowers so great a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eies: shall he haue giuen so great a sweetnesse of saour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it be vnlawfull either for our eies to take the vse of that beautie, or for our smelling to feele that sweetnesse of saour? What? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more acceptable than other? What? Hath hee not giuen to golde and siluer, to iuorie and marbie, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalls or stones? Finally, hath he not made many things commendable vnto vs without necessaric vse?

3 Therefore away with that vnaturall Philosophie, which in granting vs of the creatures no vse but of necessitie, not onely doth niggardly bereaue vs of the lawfull vse of Gods liberalitie, but also cannot take place, vnlesse it first haue spoiled man of all his senses and made him a blocke. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence provide a stay for the lust of the flesh, which if it be not brought into order, ouerfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I haue said) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie doe graunt vnto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this end, that we should knowe the author of them, and giue him thanks for his tender kindnesse toward vs. Where is thy thanks giuing, if thou so gluttonously fill thy selfe with daintie meates or with wine, that thou either be made senselesse, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by too great abundance boyling in filthy lust, doth with her vncleannesse infect thy minde, that thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulnessse to God, if with costly gorgeousnesse thereof we both fall in admiration of our selues and disdaine other? If with the trimnesse and cleanness of it, we prepare our selues to vnichastitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gaynesse of our apparell? For many to giue all their senses to bodily delights, that the minde herth ouerwhelmed. Many are so delighted with marbie, gold and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marbie, that they be as it were turned into metalls, and be like vnto painted images. The smell of the kitchen, or sweetnesse of saour so dulseth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licentiousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, and that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lesse thereof, to which if we graunt too much, they boile out about measure and temper.

4 But there is no surer nor readier way than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heavenly immortallitie. For thereupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vse this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that marry wiues, as though they did not marry: they that buy, as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne, as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately.

but also for delight, where is no cause why men for whom they are made, may not vse them as well to the one as the other.

Psal. 104. 15.

Our acknowledging with thankfulnessse that all good things are received at the hands of God, bridleth the excessive abuse of meates, apparell, furniture, & all things needfull vnto life.

Rom 13. 14.

The light esteemacion of this present life, & the earnest meditation of immortallitie, cureth off the other great care which men haue of outward things.

Cap. 10. Of the maner how to receiue

1. Cor. 7. 3.

He that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not onely the intemperance of gluttonie in meate and drinke, and too much deintynesse, sumptuousnesse, pride, hautesse, and nicenesse, in fare, building, and apparell, but also al care and affection that may either withdraw thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heavenly life, or from studie to garnish thy soule. But this was long ago truly said of Cato: that there is great carefulnesse of trimming our bodie, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an olde prouerbe, that they which are much busied in care of their body are commonly carelesse of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truly it must be subiect to this lawe, to beare very little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon themselues with continually bent minde, to cut off all shew of superfluous plentie, much more to restraints riotous excesse, and to take diligent heed, that they doe not of helpes make to themselues hinderances.

*A mind contented consents, and persuaded that it standeth accountable to God for things receiued, will easily moderate it selfe in the vse of earthlike

5 The other rule shall be, that they that haue but small and slender riches, may learne to lacke patiently, that they be not carefully moued with immeasurable desire of them: with patience they that keepe, haue not a little profited in the Lordes schoole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to prooue himselfe the scholler of Christ. For beside this that the most part of other vices doe accompanie the desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which will be ashamed of a poore coate, will be proud of a costly coate: he that will not be content with a hungrie supper, will be disquieted with desire of a daintier, and would also intemperately abuse those dainties if he had them: he that hardly and vnquietly beareth a priuate and base estate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that haue an vnfaigned zeale of godlinesse, endeouour to learne by the Apostles example, to be full and hungrie, to haue store, and suffer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the precepts of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifullnesse of God, and appointed for our commoditie, that they may be as things deliuered vs to keepe, whereof we must one day yeeld an account. We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying may continually found in our cares, yeeld an account of thy bailiwike. Therewithall let this also come in our minde. Who it is that asketh such an account, euen he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobriete, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnesse, pride, ostentation, and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goodes, but such as is ioyned with charitie: which hath already with his owne mouth condemned all those delightfull things that doe withdraw a mans mind from chastitie and cleannesse, or doe dull his wit with darknesse.

Philip. 4. 12.

*The consideration
of that wherunto God hath called vs, is the last rule and the best direction for the guidance of al actions which are incident
into this life.*

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth euery one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is carried hither and thither, how greedie his ambition is to holde diuers things at once. Therefore that all things should not be confounded with our follie and rashnesse, he hath appointed to euery man his dutie in severall kindes of life. And that no man rashly run beyonde his bounds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therefore euerie mans severall kinde of life is vnto him as it were his standing appointed him by God, that they should not all their life vncertainly wander about. And this diuision is so necessarie, that all our doings are measured thereby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the iudgement of mans reason and Philosophie. There is no dede accounted more noble, euen among the Philosophers, than for a man to deliuer his country from tyrannie: but by the voice of Gods iudgement the priuate man is openly condemned

that

that layeth hand vpon a tyrant. But I will not tarrie vpon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we know that the calling of the Lorde is in euery thing the beginning & foundation of well doing: to which hee that doth not direct himselfe, shall neuer keepe a right way in his doings. He may peradventure sometime do somewhat seeming worthe of praise: but whatsoever that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shall be reiected: moreover there shall be no conuenient agreement in the parts of his life. Therefore our life shall then be best framed, when it shall be directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne rashnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his bounds. He that shall be a man of base estate, shall contentedly liue a priuate life, lest he should forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Againe this shall be no small reliefe to cares, labours, griefes and other burdens, when a man shall knowe that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the houtholder will binde himselfe to his duetie: euery man in his kind of life will beare and passe through the discomforts, cares, tediousnes, and anguishes thereof: when they are perswaded that euery mans burden is laide vpon him by God. Hereupon also shall grow singular comfort, forasmuch as there shall be no worke so filthy and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the iustification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I Thinke I haue already sufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men The matter of iustification: the chiefest state whereby religion is upheld. being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recouer saluation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefits of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what fruits it bringeth forth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is giuen vs by the goodnes of God, and conceiued and possessed of vs by faith, by partaking of whom wee receiue principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may now in steed of a iudge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the second, that being sanctified by his spirite, we may giue our selues to innocencie, and purenes of life. As for regeneration, which is the second grace, we haue already spoken of it as much as seemed to be sufficient. The manner of iustification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to vnderstande both howe the Faith by which alone we receiue freely giuen righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good workes: and also what be the good workes of the holy ones, whercupon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are fitt to be thoroughly discussed, & so discussed that we must remember that this is the chiefe staye of vs holding religion, that we may be the more carefull and heedfull about it. For vnkilse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his iudgement is of thee: as thou hast no grounde to stablish thy saluation, so hast thou also none to raise thy recient feare towards God. But the necessitie of this knowledge shall better appeere by knowledge it selfe.

2 But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should do if we should enter disputation of a thing vnknown) let vs first declare what is ment by these speeches, Man to be iustified before God, To be iustified by faith or by workes. He is said to be iustified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iust & accepted for his owne righteousnes sake. For as wickednesse is abhominable before God, so a sinner cannot finde fauour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore wheresoeuer sinne is, there also appeereth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a iust man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the iudgement seat of God when all sinners fall. As if an innocent be brought to be arraigned before the seate of a righteous iudge, when iudgement is giuen according to his innocencie, he is saide to be iustified before the iudge: so he is iustified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witness and affirmer of his righteousness. Therefore after the same manner a man shall be saide to be iustified by workes, in whose life there is found such cleannes and holines, as may deserue the testimonie of righteousness before the throne of God: or he that with the vprightnes of his workes is able to answer and satisfie Gods iudgement. Contrariwise he shall be saide to be iustified by faith that being excluded from the righteousness of workes, doth by faith take hold of the righteousness of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeereth in the sight of God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expound iustification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiveness of sins, and imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

*Prooue that iustification is taken for Gods acqui-ting men from sin, and his imputing vnto them the righteousnes which is in Christ.

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it cannot be denied, that this is the proper and most vsed signification of the worde. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shall be enough to put the readers in minde of them, for they may of themselves easily marke them. But I will bring forth some, where this iustification that wee speake of is expressly enuicared of by name. First, where Luke saith that the people when they had heard Christ did iustifie God. And where Christ pronounceth that wisdom is iustified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they doe giue righteousness, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world go about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of iustification righteous, which hath euer that of it selfe. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to giue to God and his doctrine the praise that they deserue. Againe when Christ reproceheth the Pharisees, that they iustifie themselves, hee doth not meane that they obtaine righteousness by well dooing, but do vaingloriously seeke for the fame of righteousness, wherof indeed they be void. They that are skilful of the Hebrue toong do better vnderstand the sence of this phrase: in which toong they are not only called wicked doers, that are guiltie in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of iudgement of condemnation. For when Bryssabe saith that the and Salomon shall be wicked doers, shee doth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that she and her sonne shall be put to shame, to be numbered among the reprobate and condemned. But by the proccesse of the text it easily appeereth, that the same worde in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, & not to signify any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that we are now in hand with, here Paul saith, that the scripture did foresee, that God iustifieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man vnderstand thereby, but that God doth impute righteousness by faith? Againe, when he saith that God iustifieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefit of faith to deliuer them from the damnation which their wickednes deserued? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when hee cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustifieth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yet that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he should say, Who shall accuse them whom God acquitteth? Who shall condemne them whose part one Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from guiltinesse as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God doth iustifie vs by the intercession of Christ, he doth acquite vs, not by allowance of our own innocencie, but by imputation of righteousness, that we may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selues. So in the 13. Chapter of the Actes, in Pauls sermon: by him is forgiveness of finnes preached vnto you, and euery one that beleueth in him is iustified from all those things, from which you could not be iustified in the Law of Moses. You see that after forgiveness of finnes, iustification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for abolition, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the Lawe, you see that it is the mere beneficiall gift of Christ, you see that it is receiued by Faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where he saith that we are iustified from finnes by Christ. So when it is said that the Publicane came iustified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousnesse by any deserting of workes. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his finnes obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approouing of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrrose sayeth verie well, that calleth the confession of finnes a lawfull iustification.

Luc. 18. 14.

In Psal. 118.
Homil. 10.

4 But to leaue standing about the word: If we looke vpon the thing it selfe, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truly Paul doth expresse iustification by the name of acceptation, when he saith (Ephes. 1. 5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christ, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious fauour, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in fauour. For the same is meant by it that is saide in another place, that God doeth freely iustifie. In the 4. Chapter to the Romanes, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousnesse, and sticketh not to say that it consisteth in forgiveness of finnes. That man (said he) is called of Dauid a blessed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteousnesse without workes, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truly he there doth intreat not of one part of iustification, but of all iustification wholly. And he testifieth that Dauid in that place maketh a definition of iustification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is giuen free forgiveness of finnes. Whereby appeareth that this righteousnesse whereof he speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrarie to guiltinesse. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth that this is the summe of the message of the Gospell, that we should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receive vs into fauour through Christ, in not imputing finnes vnto vs. Let the Readers diligently wey all the whole processe of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to expresse the manner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing else by the worde reconciling but iustifying. And that which he saith in another place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, vnlesse we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our selues.

Iustification expressed in Scripture by acceptation into fauour, desired by pardon, of positive and guiltines, concerned in the name of reconciliation.

5 But where as Oslander hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiall righteousnesse, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousnesse, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereaue them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is woorth the labor to confute this daring error. First this speculation is but of mere and hungry curiositie. He doth in deede heape together many testimonies of Scripture, to proue that Christ is one with vs, and we one with him, which needeth no prooffe: but because he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he snareth himselfe. But we which hold that we are made all one with Christ by the power of his spirite, may easily vndoe all his knots. He had conceived a certaine thing very neare to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to conuey the substance of God into men. Hereupon riseth another inuention of his that Adam was fashioned after the Image of God, because euen before the fall Christ was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I will tarry vpō the matter that I haue presently in hand. Hee saith that we are one with Christ. We graunt. But we deny that the substance of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreover we say that this principle, that Christ is righteousnesse to vs, because he is an eternall God, the fountaine of righteousnesse and the verie selfe righteousnes of God, is wrongfully drawen to defende his deceites. The readers shall pardon me, if I do now but touch these things that the order of teaching requireth to be deferred vnto another place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing else by the name of essentiall righteousnesse, but to resist this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christes sake: yet he plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousnes that is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but saith that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitic powred into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that not onely Christ, but also the Father and the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs. Which although I graunt to be true, yet I say that hee wrongfully wresteth it. For he should haue considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the father and the holy Ghost are in Christ, and as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possesse whole God in him. Therefore all that he saith feuerally of the father and the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other end but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God powring himselfe into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himselfe. For he reckoneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we growe into one with Christ, and that he is our head and wee his members, vnles his very substance be mingled with vs. But in the father and the holy Ghost (as I haue said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinketh, euen this, that we be iustified not by the onely grace of the Mediator, and that righteousnes is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteousnes of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

Oslanders opinion concerning iustification.

Cap. 11. Of the maner how to receiue

Ofenders first error, that iustifying righteousnes is not a free imputation of holmes, but a holmes which the substance of God remaining in vs doth worke.

6 If he did say no more, but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentiall conioyning made ours: and that not onely he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is powred into vs: He should with lesse hurt feede himselfe daintly, and peradventure so great a contention should not haue bene raised for this dotting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke blood hideth her many tailes, we must needes earnestly resist vnlesse we will wittingly and willingly suffer that righteousnes to be taken from vs, which onely bringeth vs confidence to glorie of saluation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousnes, and this word iustifying, extend to two parts: that to be iustified is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteousnes is not a free imputation but a holynes and vprightnesse, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then hee stoutly denyeth, that Christ is our righteousnes in respect that being a priest he did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appease his father toward vs, but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To prooue that first point, that God doth iustifie not onely by forgiuing but also by regenerating, hee asketh whether God doeth leaue them whom he doth iustifie such as they were by nature, chaunging nothing of their vices. The answer hee eot is verie eatic: that as Christ cannot be torne in partes, so these two things which we together and ioyntly receiue in him, that is to say righteousnes and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore, whomsoever God receiueth into fauour, he doth also therewithall giue them the spirit of adoption, by the power whereof he newly fashioneth them after his image. But if the brightnesse of the sunne cannot bee seuered from the heate thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, The sunne with his heate giueth life and fruitfulnessse to the earth, with his beames he giueth light and brightnesse. Heere is a micuall and vnsparable conioyning: yet reason forbiddeth to conuay to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osiander trusteth in. For because God doth in deede renew them to the obseruing of righteousnesse whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be all one and the selfe same thing. But the Scripture ioyning them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifolde grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse and sanctification. And whensoever he reasoneth to prooue by the saluation purchased for vs by the fatherly loue of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holinesse and cleanness, hee plainelicly declareth, that it is one thing to be iustified, and another to be made newe creatures. But when Osiander commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he alleageth. Where Paul saith that Faith is accounted for righteousnesse to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that iustifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he deprauech all the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, and sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euen now alledged, Who shall accuse the electes of God? it is God that iustifieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of guiltines and acquitting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osiander is found too fond a babbler, as well in that reason as in alledging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he speake of the name of righteousnes, in saying that Faith was accounted to Abraham for righteousnes, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteousnes of God and God himselfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteousnes that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he receiued by Faith the grace offered in the promise. Whereupon followeth, that in iustification there is no place for workes, as Paul very well affirmeth.

1. Cor. 1. 30.

Rom. 4. 5.

7 As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that the power of iustifying is not in Faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiuech Christ, I willingly graunt it. For if Faith did iustifie of it selfe, or by inward force, as they call it, and as it is alway feeble and vnperfect it could not worke iustification but in part, so should the iustification be maymed, that should giue vs but a peece of saluation. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking doe say that God onely iustifieth: and then we giue the same to Christ, because he was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse: and Faith we compare as it were to a vessell. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our Soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receiue Christ. Whereupon we gather that we doe not take from Christ the power of iustifying, when we teach that he is first receiued by Faith, before that his righteousnes be receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when he sayeth that Faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not vnlike, but that Faith although it be by it selfe of no worthnesse or price, may iustifie vs in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that Faith, which is onely the instrument to receiue righteousnes, is vnjustly mingled with Christ which is the materall cause and both Author and Minister of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolved. How this word Faith ought to be vnderstanded when we entreat of iustification.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the inward word is receiued by the ministracion of the outward word, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthood of Christ and the person of the Mediatour to his outward Godhead.

Iustification granted by Osiander to be through beleuung, so that beleefe be taken for Christ which is beleued.

Cap. I I. Of the maner how to receiue

As for vs, we diuide not Christ, but we say that he is the same eternall word of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousness: and we confesse that otherwise he could not haue fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchased vs righteousness, vnlesse he had bene eternall God. But this is Oslanders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that he was made righteousness vs, in respect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhood. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it shal not be peculiar to Christ, but common with the father and the holy ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousness of the one, and another of the other. Moreouer, that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conveniently said to be made to vs. But although we grant this, that God was made righteousness for vs: how shall it agree that that which is set betweene, is made of God? Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is seuerally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But he foolishly triumpheth in that one word of Hieremie, where he promisseth that the Lord Iehoua shall be our righteousness, but out of that hee shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousness, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In another place we haue rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that God purchased to himselfe the Church with his blood, if any man gather thereupon, that the blood wherewith sinns were purged was diuine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can abide so seule an error? But Oslander thinketh that with this so childish a cauillation he hath gotten all things, he swelleth, he leapeth for ioy, and stufseth many leaues full with his bigge words: when yet there is a plaine and readie solution for it in saying that the word Iehoua indeed when he is made the issue of Dauid shall be the righteousness of the godly: But Esay teacheth in what sense, saying: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Let vs note that the father speaketh: that he giueth to the son the office of iustifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setteth the maner or meane as they call it in the doctrine whereby Christ is known. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this word D.rah knowledge passiuely. Hereupon I gather first that Christ was made righteousness when he did put on the forme of a seruant: secondly, that he did iustifie vs in respect that he shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore hee doth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed vnto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousness, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappy disagreement estranged from his righteousness we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may iustifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

9 If he object that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is about the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I grant: but in the second I say that he is vnwisely deceived. For although Christ could neither cleanse our soules with his blood, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from guiltinesse, nor do the office of a priest, vnlesse he had bene true God, because the strength of the flesh had bene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he performed all these things according to his nature of manhoode. For if it be demanded how we be iustified, Paul answereth, by the obedience of Christ. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking vpon him the shape of a seruant? whereupon we gather that righteousness was given vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other words (which I maruell that Oslander is not ashamed to alleage so often) hee appointeth the fountaine of righteousness no where else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe no sinne hee made sinne for vs, that we might bee the righteousness of God in him. Oslander with full mouth aduanceth the righteousness of God, and triumpheth as though he had prooued that it is his imaginatiue ghost ghost of essentiall righteousness: when the words sounde farre otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Verie young beginners should not haue beene ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in Iohn, where the glorie of God is compared with the glorie of men. I know that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof God is the author and which God giueth vs: but though I say nothing, the Readers that haue their sound wit, doe perceiue that nothing else is meant in this place, but that wee stande vpriight before the iudgement seate of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christs death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Osiander do agree with vs in this point that wee are iustified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propitiatorie sacrifice for vs, which cannot agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sort, when Christ meaneth to seale the righteousness and saluation that he hath brought vs, he setteth before vs an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. He doth in deede call himselfe the liuely bread, but expressing the manner heere, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his blood is verily drinke. Which manner of teaching is seene in the sacraments, which although they direct our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousness and saluation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that he is onely man, he either iustificth or quickeneth of himselfe, but because it pleased God to shewe openly in the mediatur that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for vs, out of which we may draw that which otherwise shoulde without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepe spring that riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the mediatur. In this maner & meaning, I do not deny that Christ as he is God & man doth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the Father and the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousness whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, is the eternall righteousness of the eternall God, so that he yeelde to the sure and plaine reasons that I haue alleaged.

10 Now that he should not with his cauillations deceiue the vnskillfull, I graunt that we want this incomparable benefite, till Christ be made ours. Therefore wee set that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hartes, and that mysticall vnion, in the highest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not behold him afarre off out of our selues, that righteousness may be imputed vnto vs, but because we haue put on him, and are grafted into his body: finally because hee hath vouchsafed to make vs one with him, therefore we glorie that we haue a fellowship of righteousness with him. So is Osianders slanderous cauillation confuted, where hee saith that we cannot faith righteousness, as though we spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith emptie to him, to giue roume to his grace, that he onely may fill vs. But Osiander refusing this spirituall conioyning, enforceth a grosse mingling with the faithfull, and therefore hee odiously calleth all them Zwinglians that subscribe not to his fantasticall error, concerning essentiall righteousness: because they do not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lords supper. As for me, I count it a great glory to be so reproched of a proud man and giuen to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but also other writers wel known to the world, whom he ought to haue modestly reuerenced. It moueth me nothing, which meddle not with mine owne priuate cause: and so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Whereas therefore he so importunately requirerth essentiall righteousness, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this ende: first that God should with a grosse mixture poure himselfe into vs, as hee faineth a fleshy eating of Christ in the supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousness into vs, wherby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion,

Although wee be not iustified vnlesse Christ doe dwell in our hartes, yett is not the essentiall possessing of Christ as God which doth iustifie.

Cap. II. Of the maner how to receiue

this righteousnesse is as well God himselfe, as the goodnesse or holinesse, or purenesse of God. I will not spend much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heavenly life to this present state. Through Christ (saith Peter) are giuen vs the pretious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were now such as the Gospell promised that we shall be at the last coming of Christ: yea Iohn telleth vs, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shall be like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a small tast to the readers, that I do of purpose passe ouer these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

1. Pet. 1. 4.

The earnest assurance of saluation ensebled by Oslander taking the iustificatio in sich is by righteousnesse impaired.

II But in the second point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I thinke I haue already sufficiently proued, that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and fruitlesse, and of it selfe so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthily to be vnfaourie to sound and godly Readers. But this is an vtolerable wickednesse, vnder pretense of double righteousnesse, to enseble the earnest assurance of saluation, and to carie vs aboute the cloudes, that we should not embrace by faith the grace of propitiation, and call vpon God with quiet mindes. Oslander scorneth them, that teach that this word Iustifying is a lawe terme: because, we must be righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be iustified by free imputation. But, if God do not iustifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be iudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner how is declared, for that God iustifieth by forgiuing, as in another place iustification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of them as contraries, doth clearly shew that it is a phrase borrowed from the vie of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanely praised in the Hebrew tongue, if he haue a sober braine, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Now where Paul saith that Dauid described the righteousnesse without workes, in these words, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiven: Let Oslander answere me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witness, as though he taught that forgiveness of sinnes is but a part of righteousnesse, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the iustifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousnesse in free forgiveness, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whome God hath forgiven iniquities, and to whome he imputeth no transgressions. He doth measure and iudge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous indeede, but by imputation. Oslander taketh exception and faith, that this should be slanderous to God, and contrarie to his nature, if he should iustifie them that in deede remaine still wicked. But we must remember, as I haue already saide, that the grace of iustifying is not severed from regeneration although they be suerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently known by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remnants of sinne, it must needes be that they be farre otherwise iustified than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation. God do begetteth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by little and little, and sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seate in dangier of the iudgement of death. But he iustifieth them not by partialed, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenesse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteousnesse could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because we be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of iustification is misturned, yea, ouerturned from the very foundation, whē doubting is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken, when the free and dreadlesse inuo-cation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall ioy is not stablfished. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to proue, that the in- Gal. 3.18.

 heritance is not by the lawe. For by this meane faith should be made voidē, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrowen, because none of the most holy shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of iustifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two sorts of righteousnesse) is verie well expressed by Paul: for speaking of his reall righteousnes in deede, or of Rom. 7.24.
 the vprightnesse wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousnesse) he lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? But flying to the righteousnes which is grounded vpon the Rom. 8.33.
 onely mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the elects of God whome he iustifieth? For I am surely perswaded, that nothing shall feuer vs from his loue in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousnes which alone fully sufficeth to saluation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a little before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glorie. This duersitie is sufficiently knowen, and so familiar to all the holy ones, that gone vnder the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue all feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagreeth with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holy ones with a double righteousnes as it were with a furred garmēt, yet he is compelled to confesse that without forgiveness of sinnes they neuer pleased God.
 If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous in deed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how farre shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousnes? shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? Truly he shall hang doubtfull and wauering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousnes as shall be necessarie to stablish confidence. It is hap-pie that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not iudge of this cause. But this shall stand stedfast, that thou maicst be iustified in thy sayings and ouercome when thou Psal. 51.6.
 art iudged. But how great presumption is it to condemne the chiefe iudge when he freely acquiteth, that this answerē may not be inforce, I will haue mercie vpon whome I will haue mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this end that he should spare none, but that he should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offence. And we do say that they which were lost haue their sinnes buried and so are iustified before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he can loue none but them whome he iustifieth. But this is a maruellous manner of iustifying, that they being covered with the righteousings of Christ stand not in feare of the iudgement which they haue deserued, and when they worthily condemne themselues are accounted righteous without themselues.

12 But the readers are to be warned, that they take good heede to the mysterie which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely traucted to proue that we do not obtaine fauour with God by the onely imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vic his owne words) at length he concludeth that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse, not in respect of his nature of manhood but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousnesse cannot be found but in the person of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteousnesse not of man but of God, he doeth now binde vp his rope made of two righteousnesse, but

Cap. I I. Of the maner how to receiue

he plainly taketh away the office of iustifying from Christes nature of manhood. But it is good to see how he disagreeeth. It is saide in the same place, that Christ was made vnto vs wisdom, which belongeth to none but to the eternall worde. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisdom. I answer that the onely begotten sonne of God was in deede his eternall wisdom, but in Pauls writings that name is giuen him in diuers wise, because all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are laid vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he disclosed vnto vs: and so that which Paul saith is not referred vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our vse, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhood: because although he shined a light in darknesse, before that he did put on flesh, yet it was a hidden light till the same Christ came forth in the nature of man, the shining sunne of righteousness, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the world. Also it is foolishly objected of him, that the power of iustifying is farre about both Angels and men: for as much as this hangeth not vpon the woorthinesse of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels wil take vpō them to satisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subiect to the law, to redeeme vs from the curse of the law. Also he doth slanderously cauil, that they which denie that Christ is our righteousness according to his nature of Godhead, do leaue but one part of Christ, and (which is worse) doe make two Gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they say againe that we are not righteous by the righteousness of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we doe not by and by take away that honor from whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in the flesh, but we only make a distinction how the righteousness of God is conieued vnto vs, that we may enjoy it. In which point Oslander hath too fowly erred. Neither doe we denie that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, proceedeth from the secret grace and power of God: and we strue not against this, that the righteousness which Christ giueth vs is the righteousness of God that proceedeth from God: but we hold this stedfastly, that we haue righteousness and life in the death and resurrection of Christ. I ouer passe that heaping together of places whereof he may wel be ashamed, wherewith he hath tediously combred the readers without choise and without common reason, to prouue that where soeuer is made mention of righteousness, there ought to be vnderstanded this essentiall righteousness. As where Dauid calleth vpon the righteousness of God to helpe him: whereas he doth in summe about an hundred times, Oslander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other obiection, that that is properly & rightly called righteousness, whereby we be moued to doe rightly, but that God onely worketh in vs both to will and to performe. For we doe also not denie, but that God reformeth vs with his spirite vnto holinesse of life and righteousness: but we must first see whether he doe this by himselfe and immediately, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left all the fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the neede of his members. Moreouer, although righteousness come vnto vs out of the secret fountain of the Godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousness vnto vs according to his nature of Godhead. No lesse fond is that which he saith, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousness of God. Because vnlesse the will of his father had moued him, he could not himselfe haue satisfied the office committed vnto him. For though we haue in another place said, that all the deseruings of Christ himselfe do proceed from the meer good wil of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantastical thing, wherewith Oslander bewitcheth both his owne and simple mens eies. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountaine and beginning of our righteousness, therefore we be essentially righteous, & the essence of Gods righteousness dwelleth in vs? In redeeming the church (saith Esay) Esay. 59. 17. God did put on his righteousness as a harness: but did he so to spoyle Christ of his armor which he had given him, to make him to be no perfect redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other words, saying, that he gaue vs saluation to the shewing of his righteousness. But this Rom. 3. 23. doeth not ouerthrow that which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whosoever wappeth vp a double righteousness, that poore soules may not rest in the meere onely mercie of God, he doeth in a mockerie crowne Christ with thornes. Rom. 5. 19.

13 But forasmuch as a great part of men, imagineth righteousness to be made of faith and works, let vs first shew this also, that the righteousness of faith and works do so differ, that when the one is established, the other must needs be ouerthrowen. The Apostle saith that he esteemed all things as dounge, that he might winne Christ, and finde in him the righteousness that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousness that which is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Iesus Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries, and that here is declared that he which will obtaine the righteousness of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousness. Therefore in another place he saith, that this was the cause of fall to the Iewes, that going about to establish their owne righteousness, they were not subiect to the righteousness of God. If in establishing our owne righteousness we shake away the righteousness of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousness our owne must be utterly abolished. And he sheweth the same thing, when he saith, that our glorying is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Whereupon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousness of works, how little soeuer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorie vpon. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousness of works can no wise be coupled with the righteousness of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, that he leaueth no room for caillations or shifts: If (saith he) Abraham was iustified by works, he hath glorie. And immediatly he addeth: but he hath no glorie in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not iustified by works. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to works, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the desertings of works. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousness made of faith and works mingled together. Rom. 10. 3. Rom. 3. 27. Rom. 4. 2.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they haue a subtle shift, that make to themselves sport and pastime with wresting of Scripture and with vaine caillations. For they expound works in that place to be those which men not yet regenerate do only literally and by the endeouour of free will without the grace of Christ: and do say that it belongeth not to spirituall works. So by their opinion a man is iustified both by faith and by works. So that the works be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ and fruites of regeneration. For they say that Paul spake so for none other cause, but to counce the Iewes, trusting vpon their owne works, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousness to themselves, sith the onely spirit of Christ doeth giue it vs, and not any indeuour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparison of the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of the Gospell, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all works are excluded with what title soeuer they be adoined. For he teacheth that this is the righteousness of the law, that he should obtaine saluation that hath performed that which the Law commandeth: and that this is the righteousness of faith, if we beleue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreover wee shall hereafter shewe in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteousness are severall benefites of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the verie spirituall works come not into the account when the power of iustifying is ascribed to.

Cap. 11. Of the maner how to receiue to Faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen now alledged) that Abraham had any thing wherupon to glory before God, because he was not made righteous by works: this ought not to be refrained to the literall and outward kinde of vertues, or to the endeuour of free will. Yet although the life of the Patriarch Abraham were spirituall and in maner ngelike, yet he had not sufficient deseruings of workes to purchase him righteousness before God.

The Schoolemens error about the spirite and grace whereby mans is iustified.

15 The Schoolemen teach a little more grossly that mingle their preparations: but these doe lesse infect the simple and vnskillfull wth corrupt doctrine, vnder presence of Sprite and grace hiding the mercie of GOD which onely is able to appeare trembling confessions. But we confesse with Paul that the doers of the Law are iustified before God: but because we are all farr from the keeping of the Lawe, hereupon we gather, that the workes which should most of all haue auailed to righteousness, doe nothing helpe vs because we lacke them. As for the common Papistes or Schoolemen, they are in this point doubly deceiued: both because they call Faith an assurednes of conscience in looking for reward at the hand of God for deseruings, and also because they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousness, but the holy Ghost helping to the endeuour of holines. They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first beleue that there is a God, and then that he is a tenderer of reward to them that seeke him. But they marke not, what is the maner of seeking: And that they are deceiued in the name of grace, is plainly prooued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iustification by Christ is giuen vs two waies, First (saith he) the death of Christ doth iustifie vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hartes, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Satan held vs captiue, so that now he hath not wherby to condemne vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in iustification to be so far as we are directed to good workes by the grace of the holy Ghost. He would forsooth haue followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a far off, and goeth far out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it: if there be any thing in Augustine not very vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen haue still strained from woofe to woofe, till with headlong fall at length they berolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the very sentence of Augustine, or at least his maner of speaking is not altogether to be receiued, For though he singularly wd taketh frō man al praise of righteousness, and assigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby we are renewed into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

Heb. 11. 6.

Sent. li. 3. dist. 16. ca. 2.

The righteousness of Faith spoken of in Scripture turneth mens eyes frō their owne workes to the free goodness of God, which pardoneth sinne, and easeth sinners to feele the mercie whereby they are pardoned and in Christ made righteous.

16 But the Scripture, when it speaketh of the righteousness of Faith, leadeth vs to a far other end, that is to say, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne workes, we should onely looke vnto the mercie of God and perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of iustification, that first God vouchsaucth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere and free goodnes, considering nothing in him but miserie whereby he may be moued to mercy, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked and void of good workes, fetching from himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which despairing vpon his owne workes casteth all the summe of his saluation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of Faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into possession of his saluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining forgiveness of sinnes by meanes of the righteousness of Christ, he is iustified: and although he be regenerate by the spirite of God, he thinketh vpon continuall righteousness laid vp for him no: in the good workes to which he applyeth himselfe, but in the onely righteousness of Christ. When these things shall be euery one particularly weyed, they shall giue a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth. But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that we may haue the whole matter truly declared and surely prooued.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that we haue before saide to be betweene faith and the Gospell: because it is saide for this cause that faith without works, for that it receiuech and imbracech the righteousnesse offered in the Gospell. And whereas it is saide to be offered by the Gospell, thereby all consideration of woikes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times elswhere, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romanes, comparing the lawe and the Gospell together he saith: the righteousnesse that is by the law is thus, The man that doth these things shall liue in them. But the righteousnesse that is of faith offereth saluation, if thou belceue in thy hart and confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Gospell, that the law giueth righteousnesse to works, and the Gospell giueth free righteousnesse without helpe of works? it is a notable place, and that may deliuer vs out of many hard doubts, if we vnderstande that the same righteousnesse that is giuen vs by the Gospell is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once with great seeming of contrarictie set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the lawe, then is it not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truly the law it selfe hath also her promises. Therefore there must needes be in the promises of the Gospell, something different and diuers from the promises of the lawe, vnlesse we will confesse that the comparison is very fond. But what diuersitie shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promises of the lawe hang vpon the condition of works? Neither let any man here craipe against me, and say, that in this place the righteousnesse is reiected which men of their owne force and free will would compell God to receiue? for as much as Paul without exception teacheth that the lawe in commanding profiteth nothing: because there is none not onely of the common multitude, but also of the perfecte, that fulfilleth it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the lawe: when the spirit of God frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteousnes, but for that euē in the holie ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no reward.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is justified by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall liue by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall liue in them. Howe could this argument otherwise stand to gither, vnlesse we agree vpon this point, that woikes come not into the account of faith, but are vnto it to be serued from it? The law (saith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because works are required to the righteousnes thereof. Therefore it followeth that woikes are not required to the righteousnes of faith. By this relation it appeereth that they which are iustified by faith are iustified beside the deseruing of woikes, yea without the deseruing of woikes, because faith receiuech that righteousnes which the Gospell giueth. And the Gospell differeth from the lawe in this point, that it bindeth not righteousnes to woikes, but setteth it in the onely mercie of God. Like hereunto is that which hee affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glorie vpon, because faith was impured to him vnto righteousnes, and he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteousnes of faith, when there are no woikes to which a reward is due. Where be woikes (saith he) due reward is rendred vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the very meaning of the words that he vseth in that place serue to prooue the same. Whereas he adioyneth within a little after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, heere vpon hee gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is receiued by faith and heu commeth that, but because faith without any helpe of woikes leaneth wholly vpon the mercie of God? And in the same meaning without doubt he teacheth in another place that the righteoufnes of God was openly shewed without the law, although it hath wines borne of it by the law and the Prophets: because excluding the law, he saith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come emptie that we may receiue it.

19 By this time the Reader perceiueth with what equitie the Sophisters doe at this day caull at our doctrine, when we saie, that man is iustified by faith onely. They dare not denie that man is iustified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onely, is neuer expressed, they cannot abide to haue such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these wordes of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteoufnes is not of faith except it be freely giuen? How can free gift agree with workes? And with what cauillations wil they mock out, that which he saith in another place, that the righteoufnes of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospell? If righteoufnesse be manifestly shewed in the Gospell, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteoufnesse, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stande vpon not onely a false but also a foolish thift about this exclusiue word, Onely. Doth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onely faith, that taketh all things from workes? What, I pray you meane these sayings, that righteoufnesse was manifestly shewed without the law: that man is iustified freeke and without the workes of the law? Heere they haue a wittie thift to escape withall, which although they deuine it not themselves, but borrowed it of Origen and certaine of the olde writers, yet is verie foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall workes of law, not the morall, are excluded. They profite so with continuall brawling, that they know not the verie first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostle doctored when he alleged these places to prooue his saying? The man that shall doe these things shall liue in them: and, Cursed is euerie one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the volume of the law. Vnlesse they be made, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatned onely to the breakers of them. If these places bee to bee vnderstanded of the morall lawe, it is no doubt that the morall workes also are excluded from the power of iustifying. To the same purpose serue these arguments that he vseth: because the knowledge of sinne was by the law, therefore righteoufnesse is not by the law. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteoufnesse. Because the lawe cannot make conscience assured, therefore also it cannot giue righteoufnesse. Because faith is imputed vnto righteoufnesse, therefore righteoufnesse is not a rewarde of workes, but is giuen being not due. Because we are iustified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had bin a law giuen that might giue life, then righteoufnesse were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all vnder sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleeuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of maners: but very children woulde hiss out so great shamelesse. Therefore let vs hold this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of iustifying is taken away from the law.

20 But if any man maruaile why the Apostle vseth such an addition, not being content with onely naming workes: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although workes be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of anie righteoufnes of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime anie rewarde as due vnto them, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefore this of the bountifulnes of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name & rewarde of righteoufnes: and they be of value onely for this cause, when the purpose of him that doth them is by them to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to prooue that Abraham could not be iustified by workes, allegeth that the law was giuen, almost fowre hundred and thirte yeres after the couenant made,

Unlearned

Unlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous works before the publishing of the law. But because he knew that there was no such value in works but by the testimonie and vouchsafing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the law they had no power to iustifie. We vnderstand why he namely expretheth the worke of the law, when he meaneth to take away iustification from any workes because controuersie may be moued of those and none other. Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he saith that by the testimonie of Dauid blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousnes without works. Therefore they can with no cauillations bring to passe, but that we shal get this generall exclusiue only. And they doe in vaine seeke that trifling subtletie, that we are iustified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousnes must stand vpon loue. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith iustifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of iustifying from that effectualnesse of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane iustifie, but because it bringeth vs into the communicating of the righteousnesse of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly presseth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh, (saith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to det. But to him that worketh not, but beleeneth in him that iustifieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse. Coule he speake more evidently than in fo saying ?, that there is no righteousnesse of faith but where there are no works to which any reward is due: and that onely then faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, when righteousnesse is giuen by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is said in the definition, that the righteousnesse of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth vpon the onely forgiveness of finnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth vpon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esay excellently well set out in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortned, that he is not able to saue: nor his eare dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities haue made disagreement betwene you and your God, and your finnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the diuision betwene man and God, and the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousnesse to haue any fellowship with sinne. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enemie to God till he be restored into fauour by Christ. Whome therefore the Lord receiuet into ioyning with him, him he is said to iustifie: because he can neither receiue him into fauour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiveness of finnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be iudged by their works, they shall be found still sinners in deede, who yet must be free and cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleayed by hauing the spots of their finnes wiped away by forgiveness, that such a righteousness may in one word be called the forgiveness of finnes.

22 Both these are most clearly to be seene by these words of Paul, which I haue already alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing their finnes to man, and he hath left with vs the worde of reconciliation. And then he addeth the summe of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sin for vs, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. Here he nameth righteousnesse and reconciliation without difference, that wee may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousnesse to be when our finnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou hearest that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing finnes. So to the Romans he proceedeth by the testimonie of Dauid, that righteousness is imputed to man without works, because Dauid pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiven, whose finnes are covered to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by blessednesse he there meaneth righteousness. As sith he affirmeth the same to stand in the forgiveness of finnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of Iohn the Baptist singeth that the knowledge of saluation consisteth in the forgiveness of finnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the summe of saluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this maner: By him forgiveness of finnes is preached vnto you, and euerie one that beleueth in him is iustified from all these things, from which ye could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. The Apostle so knitteth the forgiveness of finnes with righteousness, that he sheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reasoneth that the righteousness is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obaine by the louing kindnesse of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange vnused speech, that the faithfull are righteous before God, not by works, but by free expectation: sith both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also doe sometime so speake. For Augustine saith thus in one place: The righteousness of the saints in this worlde standeth rather in forgiveness of finnes, than in perfection of vertues. Wherewith agreeth the notable sentence of Bernard: Not to sinne is the righteousness of God: but the righteousness of man, is the mercifull kindnesse of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to vs righteousness in abolition, and therefore that they onely are righteous that haue obtained pardon by mercie.

23 Hereupon also followeth this, that by the onely meane of Christs righteousness, we obtaine to be iustified before God. Which is as much in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousness of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthwhile to bee heede fully marked. For that trifling error vanisheth away, to say that man is therefore iustified by faith, because faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine aboue taught, that they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is no doubt that he is void of his owne righteousness, that is taught to seeke righteousness without himselfe. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly when he writeth that he which knew no sinne was made for vs a propitiatory sacrifice to cleanse away sinne, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. You see that our righteousness is not in vs but in Christ, and that it belongeth to vs onely by this rule, because we be partakers of Christ, because we possesse all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrarye that in another place he teacheth, that sinne was condemned of sinne in the flesh of Christ, that the righteousness of the lawe might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but that which we obtaine by imputation. For the Lord Christ doth in such sort communicate his righteousness with vs, that after a certaine maruelous manner, he pouereth the force thereof into vs, so much as pertaineth to the iudgement of God. It appeereth that he did no otherwise meane, by the other sentence which he had spoken a litle before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are iustified. What is it else to set our righteousness in the obedience of Christ, but to affirme that hereby onely we are accounted righteous, because the obedience of Christs imputed vnto vs as if it were our owne? Therefore me thinkes that Ambrose hath excellently well shewed how there is an example of this righteousness in the blessing of Iacob. For Iacob hauing not of himselfe deserved the preeminence of the first begotten sonne, hid himselfe in the apparell of his brother, and being clothed with his brothers coate that saoured of a most sweete sinel, he crept into the fauor of his father, and receiued the blessing to his owne commodity vnder the person of another: so we do lie hidden vnder the precious purenesse of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimonie of righteousnes in the sight of God. The words of Ambrose are these. Whereas Isaac smelt the saour of the garments, peradventure this is ment thereby, that we are not iustified by workes but by faith: because fleshly weaknes hindreth works, but the brightnes of faith which meriteith forgiveness of sins, ouersadoweth the error of deeds. And truly so it is. For, that we may appeere before the face of God vnto saluation, it is necessary for vs to smell sweetely with his odour, and to haue our fautes couered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That to the end we may be fully persuaded of the free iustificacion, we must lift vp our mindes to the iudgement seat of God.

Although it appeereth by most euident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not cleerely perceiue how necessary they be, vntill we haue set before our eyes those things that ought to be the groundes of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that we purpose not to speake of the righteousnesse of a worldly iudiciall court, but of the heauenly iudgement seate: that we shoulde not measure by our owne small portion, by what vprightnes of works Gods iudgements may be satisfied. But it is maruellous to see with what rashnes and boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be feene how none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteousnes of works, than they that are either monstrously sicke of open outward diseases, or be ready to burst with inwarde vices. That commeth to passe becauie they thinke not vpon the righteousnesse of God, whereof if they had neuer so little feeling, they would neuer make so great a mockery of it. And truly it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but euery way whole and absolute, and defiled with no vncleannes: such as neuer was and neuer shall be able to be founde in man. It is indeed easie and ready for cuery man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthines of workes to iustifie men: But when they come into the sight of God, such dalliance must auoide, because there is earnest dooing vsed, and no trifling strife about words. To this, to this I say, we must apply our mind, if we wil profitablie enquire of true righteousnes, how may we answer the heauenly iudge whie he calleth vs to accout. Let vs thinke him to be a iudge, not such a one as our own vnderstandings do of themselves imagine: but such a one as he is painted out in the scripture, with whose brightnes the stars shall be darkaed, by whose strenght the hills do melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wise dome the wife are taken in their subtletie, by whose purenes all things are prooued vnpure, whose righteousnesse the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pearceth to the bottoome of hell. If hee (I saie) sit to examine mens doomings, who shall appeere assured before his throne? who shall dwell with a denouering fire? saith the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings? he that walketh in righteousnesse & speaketh truth, &c. Put let such a one come fourth, whatsoeuer he be. But that answer maketh that none cometh fourth. For this terrible saying foundeth to the contrarie: Lorde if thou marke iniquities, Lorde, who shall abide it? truly all must needs immediately perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be iustified if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer then his maker? Beholde they that seue him are not faithfull, and he hath founde peruersenesse in his Angels. How much more shall they that dwell in houses of claie and that haue an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes? they shall be cut downe from the morning to the euening. Behold among his Saintes there is none faithfull, and the heauens are not cleane in his sight: howe much more

The cause of men presuming so much upon the righteousnesse of their own works is their not considering howe exact purity it must be that shall answer the lawe when it cometh to be strictly examined before the iudgement seate of God.

*Esa. 33. 14.

is man abhominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt indeed that in the booke of Iob, is mention made of a righteousnes that is higher than the keeping of the law. And it is good to vnderstand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not stand to the triall of that righteousnes that passeth all senses. Therefore although Iob be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amazed, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angelike holines cannot appeale God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore will at this time ouerpasse that righteousnes which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than senselesse if so many curses wherewith the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, and among other this generall curse, Cursed is euery one that doth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shall be but vnfauorie and cold, vnlesse euery man yeeld himselfe guiltie before the heauenly iudge, and willingly throw downe and abase himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquitted.

Deut. 27. 26.

How righteous soeuer we be in comparison of other men, thus in the sight of God is not able to make us vnlesse.

2 To this, to this I say, we should haue lifted vp our eyes, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainly to reioice. It is indeed easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for euery man to thinke himselfe to haue somewhat which other ought not to despise. But when we rise vp to haue respect vnto God, then suddenly that confidence falleth to the ground and commeth to nought. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans bodie is in respect of the heauen. For the sight of the eie, so long as it continueth in viewing things that lie neer vnto it, doth shew of what piercing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being daseled and dulled with the too great brightnes thereof, it feelth no lesse feeblenes of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perceiued strength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let vs not deceiue our selues with vaine confidence, although we count our selues either equal or superior to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose will this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildnes can not be tamed with these admonitions, he wil answer to vs as he said to the Pharisees: you be they that iustifie your selues before men: but that which is high to men is abhominable to God. Now go your way & proudly boast of thy righteousness among men, while God from heauen abhorreth it. But what say the seruants of God that are truly instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, because euery liuing man shall not be iustified in thy sight. Another saith, although in somewhat diuers meaning: Man cannot be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answer one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousness of God, euen such as can be satisfied with no workes of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thousand offences, we cannot purge our selues of one. Such a righteousness had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceived, when he professed that he knew himselfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby iustified.

3 And not only such examples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly writers do shew that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine saith, All the godly that grone vnder this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weakenes of life haue this onely hope that we haue one Mediator Iesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our finnes. What saith he? If this be their onely hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it only, he leaueh none other. And Bernard saith. And indeed wheris safe and steadfast rest and assurednes for the weak, but in the woundes of our Saviour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as hee is mightier to salue. If the world rageth, the bodie burdeneth, the diuell lieth in waite: I fall not, because I am builded vpon the sure rocke: I haue sinned a gneuous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be ouertroubled, because I shall remember the the woundes of the Lord. And hereupon afterward he concludeth, Therefore my merite is the Lords taking of mercy, I am not vtterly without merite, so long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also haue as many merites. Shall I sing mine owne rightcounes? Lord I will remember onely thy rightcounes. For that is also my rightcounes, for he is made vnto me rightcounes of God. Again in another place, This is the whole merite of man, if he put his whole hope in him that saucth whole man. Likewise where retaining peace to himselfe he leaucth the glory to God, To thee (saith he) let glory remaine vnmithed: it shall be well with me, if I haue peace, I forswear glory altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I loose that which is offered me. And more plainly in another place hee saith: Why should the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer way to glory vpon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldst aske, by what merites we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophet, I will doe it, not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, saith the Lord. It sufficeth for merite, to know what merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presume of merites, so to be without merites sufficeth to iudgement. Whereas he freely vseth this worde Merites for good workes, we must therein beare with the custome. But in the ende his purpose was to make hypocrites afraid, that wildly range with licentiousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himselfe, saying: Happy is the Church that neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. It hath whereupon to presume, but not merites. It hath merites, but to deserue, not to presume. Is not the very not presuming a deseruing? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, hauing large matter to glory vpon, euen the many mercies of the Lord.

4 This is the truth. The exercised consciences perceiue this to be the onely sanctuarie of safetie, wherein they may safely rest themselues when they haue to doe with the iudgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed most bright in the night season, doe loose their brightnes, with sight of the Sunne, what thinke we shall be come euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shall be a most seuer examination, that shall peare into the most hidden thoughtes of the hart, and (as Paul saith) shall reueale the secretes of darkenes, and disclose the hidden things of the hart, which shall compell the lurking and vsuiling conscience to vtter all things that now are fallen out of remembrance. The diuell our accuser will presse vs, which is priuie to all the wicked deeds that he hath moued vs to doe. There the outward pompous shewes of good workes which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profite vs. Onely the purenesse of will shall be required. Wherefore the hypocrisie, not onely wherby euery man knowing himselfe guiltie before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherewith euery man deceiueth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoeuer it now be proude, with more than drunken boldnes. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may indeede for a short time sweetly and pleasantly frame a rightcounes to themselues, but it is such a rightcounes as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the iudgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of rightcounes, shall certainly finde that all the works of men, if they be iudged by their owne worthines, are nothing but defilings and filthines: that that which among the common people is accompted rightcounes, is before God mere wickednes: that that which is iudged puritie, is vncleannes: that that which is reckoned glorie, is but shame.

Men iudged by their owne worthines: be they neuer so holys: shall be found vnholys.

to looke vpon our felus without flatterie or blinde affection of loue. For it is no mar-nell if we be all so blinde in this behalfe, for in such as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tendencie toward himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally stucketh fast in vs al. To euery man (saith Solomon) his owne way is right in his owne eyes. Againe. All the waies of man seeme cleane in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquitted by this blindness? No, But (as he further saith in the same place) the Lord weigheth the hearts, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outward visor or righteousnes that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lord with his ballance examineth the hidden vncleannes of the heart. Therefore sith we see nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our felus to our owne destruction. But that we may trie our felus rightly, we must necessarily call backe our conscience to the iudgement seat of God. For we do altogether neede his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruersties, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then and neuer till then, we shall cleerely perceiue what is meant hereby:
that man being rottennesse and a worne, abhominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednesse as water is far from being iustified before God. For who should make that cleane that is conceiued of vncleane feede? nor one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Iob saide of himselfe? If I will goe about to shew my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: If I will shew my selfe righteous: it will prouue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israell, that all went abay like sheepe, that euery one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehendeth all them, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examination ought to proceed so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwen downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For he is decei-ued that thinketh himselfe able to receiue the enioying of this grace, vntill he haue first throwen downe all hawtines of minde. This is a knowen saying: that God confoundeth the proude, and giueth grace to the humble.

Zeph. 3. 11.

6 But what way is there to humble our felus, but that we being altogether need-die and emptie, should giue place to the mercie of God? For I do not call it hum-blenes, if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs. And hitherto they haue taught a verie hurtfull hypocrisie that haue ioyned these two things together, that we must thinke humble of our felus before God, and that we must make some account of our owne righteousnesse. For if wee confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, wee do wickedly lie vnto him: but we cannot thinke as we ought, but that by and by all that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Ther-for when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared saluation for the humble people, and abacement for the eyes of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no cennie open to saluation, vntill thou haue laide away all pride and taken to thee perfect humblenes: then, that the same humblenes is not a certaine modestie whereby thou giuest ouer to the Lord a haire beaith of thine own right, as they are called humble before men that do neither presumptuously aduance themselues, nor reprochfully triumph ouer other, although they stand vpon some estimation of their owne excellencie: but an vnfaimed submission of a minde throwen downe with feeling of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so eachwhere described in the word of God. When the Lord saith thus in Zephaniah: I will take away out of thee him that outragiously reioyceth, and I will leaue in the mids of thee the afflicted man and the poore man, and they shall trust in the Lord: doth he not there plainly shew who be humble? euen they that he afflicted with knowledge of their owne pouertie. On the other side he calleth the proude, outrageous reioycers, because men ioying in pro-peritie are wont to reioyce without measure. But to the humble whom he pursueth to saue, hee leaueeth nothing but to trust in the Lord. And likewise it is saide

In Esaie: Whom shall I loue vnto, but to the poore and contrite in spirite, and him that feareth my words? Again: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternity, his name is holy, that dwelleth on high, and in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirite, to quicken the spirit of the humble and the hart of the contrite. When thou so oft hearest the name of contrition, vnderstand thereby the wound of the hart, that suffereth not a man throwen down on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy hart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of GOD be aduanced with the humble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mightie hand of God to thy shame and disgracement.

Esaie 6.6.
Esaie 57.9

7 And our best Schoolemaster thinking it not enough to shew it out in wordes, hath also set out vnto vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth foorth a Publicane that standing a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eyes to Heauen, with much knocking his brest, prayeth in this wise: Lord be merciful to me a sinner. Let vs not thinke these to be tokens of fained modestie, that he dare not looke vp to Heauen, nor to come neerer, that with knocking his brest he cōfesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs know that they be testimonies of inward affliction. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee which thanketh God that he is not of the common sort of men, either an oppresser, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fasted twise on the Sabbath, and gaue titles of all that he possessed. Hee doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousness which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfauoured and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednes is iustified. Hereby we may see, how great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the hart cannot be open to receiue his mercy, vnlesse it be first void of all opinion of his owne worthines. When thus opinion hath possessed the place, it shuuteth vp the way for Gods mercy to enter. And that no man should doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his Father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preach liberty to the captiue, and deliuerance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourne: to giue them glory for ashes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praise for the spirite of sorrow. According to this commission, he calleth none but them that labor and are laden to take part of his liberalitie. And in another place he saith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8 Therefore if we will giue place to the calling of Christ, let all arrogancie and carelesnes depart far away from vs. Arrogancie groweth of a foolish persuasion of our owne righteousness, when a man thinketh himselfe to haue somewhat, by the deserting whereof he may be commended before God, carelesnes may be cūn without any persuasion of workes. For many sinners, because being dronke with sweetness of vices they think not vpon the iudgement of God, like as it were senselessly amazed with a disease of drouines, that they aspire not to the mercy offered them. But we must not lesse shake off such dull sluggishnes, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our selues, that we may without encombrance hasten to Christ, that we being emptie and hungry may be filled with his good things. For we shall neuer sufficiently haue trust in him, vnles we vterly distrust of our selues, we shall neuer sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first throwne downe in our selues. We shall neuer sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse we be first desolate in our selues. Therefore we be then meete to take hold of and obtaine the fauour of God, casting away all trust of our selues, but trusting vpon the onely assurednesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine saith) forgetting our owne desertings, we embrace the giftes of Christ. Because if he sought desertings in vs, we should not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very well accordeth, comparing proud men to vnfaithfull seruantes, that arrogantly claime any thing be it neuer so little to their own desertings:

Both pride and carelesnes must be avoided.

deseruings: because they do wrongfully keepe to themselves the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would say that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receiveth through a window. But, not to tarie longer hereupon, let vs take a short but a generall and iure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath vterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of righteousness, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteousness. Because euery man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he resteth in himselfe.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That there are two things to be marked in free iustification.

We cannot without robbing God of his glory challenge any thing to our selues.
Rom. 3. 15.

AND here are alway two things to be principally looked vnto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lord his glory vnminished, and as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an vntroubled quietnes and calme tranquillitie before his iudgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to giue onely to God a confession of praise, when we entreat of righteousness. And the Apostle testifieth, that this was the Lords principall purpose of giuing vs righteousness in Christ, that he might shew his owne righteousness. And what a shewing that should be, he declareth immediately after: that is, if he alone be knowne to be righteous, and that iustified him that is of the faith of Iesus Christ. Thou seeest that the righteousness of God is not sufficiently set out, vnlesse he alone be accounted righteous, & do communicate the grace of righteousness to them that deserue it not. By this meane he will haue euery mouth to be stopped, and the whole world to be made subiect to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somewhat taken away from the glorie of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much we glorifie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickednes. You shall remember (saith he) the waies and all the wicked doings wherewith ye haue bene defiled. And ye shall be displeas'd with your selues in your owne sight, in all the euils that ye haue committed. And ye shall know that I am the Lorde, when I shall doe good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we being broosed with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then do wee to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lord any parcel be it neuer so small of the praise of his free goodnes? Likewise Jeremie whē he crieth out, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorieth glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare that somewhat is diminished from Gods glory, if man glory in himselfe? To this purpose truly doth Paul apply these words, when he teacheth that all the parts of our saluation are reposed in Christ, that wee should not glorie but in the Lord. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darkeneth his glory, whosoeuer thinketh that he hath any thing be it neuer so little of his owne.

Ezec. 10. 42.

Jer. 9. 3.

1. Cor. 1. 30.

What is it not to glory in our selues.
Rom. 2. 29.
Eph. 4. 5. 25.

2 This is the truth, we neuer truly glory in him, vnlesse we be vterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that al they glory against God that glory in themselves. For Paul iudgeth that only by this meane the world is made subiect to God, when all matter to glory vpon is vterly taken from men. Therefore Esaie, when he declareth that Israell shall haue their iustification in God, saith also that they shall there also haue their praise: as though he should say, that the Lord to this ende iustificeth the elect that they should glorie in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be praised in the Lord, he had taught in the verse next before: that is, that wee should sweare that our righteousnesses and strength are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed confirmed with an oath, that a man should not thinke that hee shall bee discharged with I wor not what fained humilitie. And let no man heere alleage for excuse that he doth not glory when without arrogancie he reknowledgeth his own righteousnes: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glorie. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteousness we must haue regard to this end, that the praise thereof remaine with the Lorde whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declarauon of his righteousness (as the Apostle testifieth) he hath powred out his grace vpon vs, that he might be iust and iustifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in another place, when hee had taught that the Lord gaue vs saluation, to set out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeating the same thing he addeth: ye are saued by grace, and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none should glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of saluation that we should declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darknes into his maruellous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the onely praises of God to sound in the eares of the faithfull, that they should with deepe silence oppresse all arrogancie of the flesh. In a sum, man cannot without robberte of God challenge to himselfe any one crum of righteousness: because euen so much is plucked and taken away from the glorie of Gods righteousness.

Rom. 3. 26.
Eph. 1. 2.
Eph. 1. 8.

3 Now if we aske by what meane the conscience may be quieted before God, we shall finde no other meane but if free righteousness be giuen vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this saying of Salomon, Who shall say, I haue clenfed my hart, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truly there is no man that shall not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthines. Therefore let euen the perfectest man descend into his owne conscience, and call his doings to account: what end shall he haue? Shall he sweetely rest as though all things were in good order betwene him and God? and shal he not rather be vexed with terrible torments, when he shal feele matter of damnation abiding in himselfe if he be iudged according to his workes? The conscience if it looke vpon God, must of necessitie either haue assured peace with his iudgment, or be besieged with the terrors of hel. Therefore we profite nothing in disputing of righteousness vnlesse we stablish such a righteousness, with the stedfastnesse whereof our soule may be staid in the iudgement of God. When our soule shall haue whereby it may both without feare appeere before the face of God, and receiue his iudgement, vnshaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue founde an vnfained righteousness. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much vpon this point, with whose words I had rather expresse it than with mine owne. If (saith he) the promise of inheritance be of the law, faith is made voide, the promise is made abolished. He first inferreth that faith is disanulled and made voide if the promise of righteousness haue respect to the deseruings of our workes, or do hang vpon the keeping of the law. For so could neuer any man assuredly rest in it: because it could neuer come to passe that any man might assuredly determine with himselfe that hee had satisfied the lawe, as indeed neuer any man doth by workes sullivanie it. Whereof, that we shoulde not neede to seeke farre for testimonies to prooue it, euerie man may be a witnesse to himselfe that will with a right eie behold himselfe, And heereby appeereth, in howe deepe and darke corners hypocrisie buried the mindes of men, while they so carelesly beare with themselves, that they sticke not to set their owne flatteries against the iudgement of God, as though they would binde to a staine his iudiciall proceeding. But the faithfull that doe sincerely examine themselves, are greued and tormented with a farre other manner of carefullnesse. Therefore there should so enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a very despair where each man for himselfe shoulde make account, with how great a burden of debt he is still ouerpressed, & how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Lo, how faith is by this mean already expressed & extinguished. For to wauer, to varie, to be caried vp and downe, to stick fast in doubting, to be holden in suspense, to stagger, and at length to despaire, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy minde with constant certainty and perfect assurednes, and to haue whereupon to rest and fasten thy foote.

4 He adioyneth also an other thing, that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and void. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang vpon our deseruing, when shall we come thus far as to deserue the bountifullnes of God? Also this second point hangeth vpon the former: For the promise shall not be fulfilled but to them that beleue it. Therefore if faith be fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise. Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to stablish the promise. For it is abundantly well stablished when it resteth vpon the onlie mercie of God: because his mercie and truth are with a perpetuall knot ioyned together, that is to say, whatsoeuer God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So Dauid before that he requited saluation by the word of God first determineth the cause thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (saith he) come vnto me, thy saluation according to thy word. And rightfully: because God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise but of his owne meere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten all our hope and not to looke to our owne workes, to seeke any help of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake any new thing: Augustine doth also teach that we ought so to do. Christ (saith he) shall reigne for euer in his seruants, God hath promised it, God hath said it, and if that be not enough, God hath sworne it. Therefore forasmuch as the promise is stablished, not according to our deseruings, but according to his mercy, no man ought to speake fearefully of that of which he cannot doubt. Bernard also saith: The disciples of Christ say, Who can be saued? But he answered, this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our onlie comfort, this is the whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibilitie, what say we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of loue or hatred? Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath bene his counsellor? Here now faith must of necessitie help vs, here must his trueth succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be receiued by the Spirit, and his Spirit testifying it may perswade our hearts that we are the sonnes of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and iustifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternall predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefely let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of conscience: and wheresoever there is any doubting or vncertaintie, it pronounceth that they be void. A gaine it pronounceth that they do nothing but stagger and wauer, if they rest vpon our owne workes. Therefore we must needs either loose righteoufnesse, or we must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift vp her eares and shut her eyes, that is to say, to be heedefully bent to the promise only, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse, or deseruing. So is that notable prophetic of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednes of the land shall be done away, a man shall call his friend vnder his vine and vnder his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull do no otherwise enioy true peace but after obtaining of the forgiveness of sinnes. For this caualation is to be remembered in the Prophets, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outward blessings of God as figures of the spirituall things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because he appeareth all the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seeke by what meane he doth it, we must needs come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For he shall neuer cease to tremble for feare that shall not determine that God is appeased by the onely satisfactory cleansing wherein Christ hath sustained his wrath. Finally peace is no where els to be sought for but in the terrors of Christ our redeemer.

5 But why do I yse so daike a testimonie? Paul euery where denieth that there is peace or quiet ioy left to consciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be iustified by faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that assurednesse commeth, namely when the loue of God is powred into our hearts by the holie Ghost: as if he had said, that our consciences cannot other wise be quieted, vnlesse we be certainly person of all the godlic, Who shall seuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ: because we shall tremble euen at euerie little breath, till we be arriued into the hauen: but we shall be without care euen in the darkenesse of death, so long as the Lord shall shew himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoever prate that we are iustified by faith, because being regenerate we are iust by liuing spiritually: they neuer tasted the sweetnesse of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull vnto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks and whatsoeuer other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith vnlesse it teach and put vs in mind of that most sweet name of Father, yea vnlesse it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba father. Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he saith that in Christ we haue boldnes and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truly this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in it selfe manifold matter of doubting. Wherefore we must of necessitie come to this remedie, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heauenly kingdome, but because being grafted into the body of Christ, they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching iustification, faith is a thing meerely passiue, bringing nothing of our owne to the recouering of the fauour of God, but re-ceiuing of Christ that which we want.

God, and seeks the assurance of our owne hearts, which we cannot do as long as we seek righteousnesse in our owne works, it followeth that to be iustified by faith, is not as some imagine to be iust by liuing according to that spirit which the faithfull haue recouered.

The xiiij. Chapter.

What is the beginning of iustification, and the continuall proceedings thereof.

THAT the matter may be made more plaine, let vs search, what may be the righteousnes of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatrie: or being entred into profession by sacraments, denying God with vnclane-nesse of life, whome they confesse with mouth, they are Christs no further than in name: or they be hypocrites, which couer the wickednesse of their hearts, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirit of God, they endeouour themselues to true holinesse. Specially when they are to be iudged by their naturall gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be found one spark of goodnes, vnlesse peraduenture we will accuse the Scripture of falshood, stubborne heart, that all the imagination of their heart is euill from their infancie, that their thoughts be vaine, that they haue not the feare of God before their eies, that none of them vnderstandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be flesh, by which word are vnderstanded all those workes which Paul reiearseth, fornication, vncleanenesse, vnchastite, riotousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witchcrafts, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissentions, sectes, enuies, manslaughter, & whatsoeuer filthinesse and abomination may be denieth. This forsooth is the worthines, knowe that God regardeth not the outward glistering, we must search the very fountaine of works if we will haue them to auail any thing to righteousnesse. We must (I say) throughly looke into them, from what affection of hart these works proceede. But although here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very few wordes, I will follow as much as I may a briefenesse in teaching.

The vertues of vnbeleuers, God both worketh and rewardeth.

2 First I denie not that whatsoever excellent giftes appeere in the vnbeleuers, they are the giftes of God. Neither doe I so differ from common iudgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betweene the iustice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, and the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthy lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Vespasian: and (that we may not carrie vpon some speciall vertues or vices) betweene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wrong, that it appeereth euen in the dead image thereof. For what thing shall there remaine well ordered in the world, if we confound these together? Therefore such a difference betweene honest and dishonest doings, the Lorde hath not onely engrauen in the mindes of all men, but also doth oft confirme it with the dispensation of his prouidence. For we see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men doe follow vertue. Not because that outward image of vertue deserueth so much as the least benefit of his: but so it pleaseth him to declare by prooffe how much true righteousnesse pleaseth him, when he suffereth euen outward and fained righteousnesse not to be without reward. Whereupon followeth that which we euen now confessed, that these vertues such as they be, or rather images of vertues are the giftes of God, for as much as there is nothing in any wise praise woorthie, which proceedeth not from him.

There is a punishable wickednes in the greatest righteousness of vnbeleuers.
Lib. 4. cont. Iulianum.

3 But neuertheless it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are strangers from the true religion of the one God, howsoever they be accounted woorthie of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely woorthie of no reward, but rather are woorthie of punishment, because they doe with defiling of their hart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God to preferre the fellowship of men with iustice, continencie, temperance of minde, valiantnesse, and wisdom: yet they doe very cuilly execute these good works of God: because they are restrained from euill doing, not by syncre loue of goodnesse, but either by onely ambition, or by loue of themselves, or by some other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the very vncleannesse of hart, as by their begining, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, than those vices which are wont to deceiue by reason of neerenesse and likenesse of vertue. Finally when wee remember, that the end of that which is right, euer is that God be serued: whatsoever tendeth to any other end, forthwith woorthily loofeth the name of right. Because therefore they haue not respect to the marke which the wisdom of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongfull end it is sinne. He concludeth therefore that all the Fabricij, Scipioes, and Catoes, in all those excellent actes of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to haue applied them: and that for that cause true righteousnesse was not in them: for as much as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the endes.

Whosoever is done by men vnreconciled vnto God it is ill done.
1. Ioan. 5. 12.
Lib. ad Boni. in cap. 5.

4 Moreouer if it be true which Iohn saith, that there is no life without the sonne of God: who so haue no part in Christ, what manner of men soeuer they be, whatsoever they doe or go about, yet they run forward with their whole course into destruction and the iudgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that said of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the vnrighteous, not by lawe of works: but by the very lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good works are turned into

into finnes. Wherefore the same Augustine saith verie well in another place, when he compareth the endeouour of such men to running out of the way. For how much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is certaine that they are cull trees, forasmuch as without the communication of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruits and beautifull to the eye, yea and sweete in taste, but in no wise good fruites. Hereby we easily perceiue that whatsoeuer man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not only of no value to righteousness, but of certaine deferring to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doubtful thing, sith it is already proued by the witness of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God without faith: Præf. in Psal.

5 But there shall yet appeare a plainer prooffe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out euery where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodnes preuenteth him. For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when he lighteth vs with the knowledge of himselfe, he is said to raise vs from death, and to make vs a new creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set fourth vnto vs by this title, God (saith he) which is rich in mercy, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euen when we were dead by finnes, hath made vs aloue together in Christ, &c. In another place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, he saith: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly beatech downe this arrogancie, in the historie of Iob, in these words: who preuenteth me, and I shall render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding applyeth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lord but meere shame of needinesse and emptinesse. Wherefore in the place aboue cited, to proue that we are come into the hope of saluation by his grace alone, not by works, he alleageth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his righteousness prouoked God, sith our first power to do good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle shall sooner be wronged out of a stone, than a good worke out of vs. Truly it is wonderfull if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindnes & loue of God our sauiour toward vs hath appeared, because he hath saued vs, not by the works of righteousness which we haue done, but according to his owne mercie: that being iustified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confession we dispoile man of all righteousness eue to the least little peece thereof, til he be by only mercie regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousness of works do bring any thing toward the iustifying of vs, it is falsly said that we are iustified by grace. Truly the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed iustification to be of free gift, which in another place reasoneth that grace is now not grace, if works do any thing auale. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he saith, that he came not to call righteous men but sinners: If only sinners are receiued, why seeke we an entrie by fained righteousness? Heb. 11. 6.

6 Still this same thought hath now and then recourse to my mind, that it is perill least I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully trauaile in promoting of this thing as though it were doubtful or darke. But because our enuiousnes is such, There is in vs no more power to do good, till God in mercie haue renewed vs, than there is in a dead bodie to exercise any action of life. Iohn. 5. 25. Eph. 2. 4.

such, as vnlesse it be most straitly thrust out of place, it neuer yeeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to tarry somewhat the longer vpon it. Yet forasmuch as the Scripture is cleere enough in this matter, I will in fighting rather v̄e the wordes thereof than mine owne. Esaï, when he hath described the vniuersall destruction of mankind, doth immediately after very fitly adioine the order of restoring. The Lord hath seene, and it seemed euill in his eyes. And he saw that there is no man: and he marueiled that there is none that offereth himselfe: and he hath set saluation in his owne arme, and hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousness. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet saith: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recouering his saluation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discouering of the reconciling of sinners to himselfe, saith: I will espouse thee to me for euer, in righteousness, iudgement, grace and mercy. I will say to her that hath not obtained mercy, thou hast obtained mercie. If such couenant, which it is certaine to be the first conioyning that we haue with God, standeth vpon the mercy of God, there is left no foundation of our own righteousness. And I would faine learne of those men which saue that man meeteth God with some righteousness of workes, whether they thinke that there is any righteousness at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madnes to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceede from his enemies, whom he wholly abhorreth with all their doings? That all we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it selfe testifieth, till being iustified, we are receiued into friendship. If iustification be the beginning of loue, what righteousness of workes shall goe before it? So Iohn, to turne away that pestilent arrogancie, doth diligently put in minde how we did not first loue him. And the selfe same thing the Lord had long before taught by his Prophet: I will loue them saith he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loue is not prouoked by workes if it hath of his owne accord inclined it, else vnto vs. But the rude comon sort of men thinke it to be nothing else, but that no man hath deserued that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the eniuing into the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our own workes. Yea, but howsoeuer we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father graffed into the communion of him, we are both heires of darkenes and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth that we are not cleansed and washed from our vncleannes by the blood of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirit auaieth vnto obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ. If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the blood of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner is without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our saluation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: Because when for Christs sake it is giuen to vs to beleue in him, then we first begin to passe from death into life.

7 Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision about set bene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleannes of conscience prouoeth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this prouoeth the want of Faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by Faith. What can sinners being estranged from God bring soorth, but that which is accursed in his iudgement? With this foolish boldenes in deed, both all wicked men are pushed vpon, and specially hypocrites, because howsoeuer they know that their whole hart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they doe any workes that haue a shew of goodnes, they thinke them worthy that God should not despise them. Hereof groweth that pernicious error, that being proued guilty of a wicked & mischieuous mind, yet they cannot be driuen to confesse themselves void of righteousness: but euen when they acknowledge themselves vnrighteous, because they cannot denie it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousness vnto them. This vanitie the Lord excellently well confuteth by the Prophet, Aske (saith he) the priestes, saying: if a man carrie sanctified flesh in the hem of his garment, and putteth it to it bread or other meate, shall it be sanctified? The priestes answered: No. And Hagee said, If a defiled man in foule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priestes answered, it shall be defiled. Hagee said: So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: and so all the works of their hands: and all things that they offer to me shall be defiled. I would to God that this saying might either get full credit with vs, or well be setled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, that can abide to be perswaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtyest man, so soone as he hath performed one or two doubtful deedes of the law, doubteth not that it shall be accounted to him for righteousness. But the Lord crieth to the contrarie, that there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnlesse the hart be first well cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that al the works whatsoever they be that proceed from sinners, are as defiled with vncleanness of the hart. Therefore let the name of righteousness depart from these works which are by the Lords owne mouth condemned of filthinesse. And with how fit a similitude doth he shew the same? For it might haue been obiected, that whatsoever the Lorde had commanded, was inuolubly holy. But he on the contrarie first setteth against them, that it is no maruell, if those things that are hallowed by the law of the Lord, are defiled with the filthinesse of naughty men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The same matter he excellently well handleth in Esay, Offer not (saith he) sacrifice in vaine: in cense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calends & solemnities. They are become tedious to mee, and I haue bene wearie with bearing them: when you shall hold vp your hands I wil turne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply praier I wil not heare: for your hands are full of blood. Be wathed, be cleane, take away the cuill of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so loatheth the obeying of his own law? Yea, but he here refuseth nothing that is of the natural obseruing of the law, the beginning whereof hee euery where teacheth to be the vnfained feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoever things are offered him are not onely trifles, but stinking and abhominable filthines. Now let the hypocrites go, and keeping peruerfnes wrapped vp in their hart, endeavour to deserue the fauour of God with works. But by this meane, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of the wicked are abhominable, and the onlie prayer of vpriight men pleaseth him. Therefore wee holde that out of doubt, which ought to be most commonly knownen to him, that is euen but meanly exercised in the Scriptures, that euen those works that glister most gloriously in men not yet truely sanctified, are so farre from righteousness in the sight of the Lord, that they be iudged sins. And therefore they haue said most truly that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by works: but contrariwise that works do then please, & neuer till then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hande. Moses writeth that the Lord had respect to Abel & to his works. See you not how he declarereth that God is fauourable to the men, before that hee hath respect to their workes? Wherefore the cleansing of the hart must go before, that the works which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God. because this saying of Ieremie is alway in force, that the workes of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is onely faith by which the harts of men are cleansed, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: where by it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and liuely faith.

The hates of hypocrites being not purged, their workes in appearance faire, cannot in the sight of God louingly be accepted.

*From the fourth sort of men, such as through Christ,

there proceedeth
no one good worke in all pannes hole and perfect.*

1. Reg 8. 6.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnesse they haue, whom wee haue set in the fourth degree. We grant that when God by the meane of the righteousnesse of Christ, reconciled vs to himselfe, and giuing vs free forgiuenes of sinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercy is also cōioined that his beneficial doing, that by his holy spirit he dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the lustes of our flesh are daile more and more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lorde vnto true pures of life, when our harts are framed to the obedience of the law: that this may be our chiefe will, to serue his will, and by all meanes to aduance onely his glorie. But euen while by the guiding of the holy Ghost wee walke in the waies of the Lorde, least we yet forgetting our selues shoulde waxe proud, there are left certaine remnants of imperfection, which may minister vs matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (saith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What maner of righteousnesse therefore will they yet get by their workes? First, I say, that the best worke that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some vncleannes of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregs mingled with it. I say, let a holy seruant of God choose out of all his life the most excellent thing that hee shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the parts of it, without doubt hee shall finde somewhere somewhat fauouring of the rottennes of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well our cheerefull quickenesse is neuer such as it ought to be, but in slackning our course our weakenes is much. Although we see that there are euident foule blots wherewith the workes of the holy are bespred, yet graunt that they be nothing but most little spots: shall they nothing offende the eyes of God, before whom euen the stars are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be iudged in it selfe, deserueth not iust reward of shame.

*If wee could doe anything perfectly good, yet the euil which wee doe,

righteousnes, God

biddeth euery vn-righteous thing

demnation.
Ezcc. 18. 24.
Iac. 2. 10.*

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible that we should haue some throughlie pure and perfect workes, yet one sinne is enough to blot out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousnes, as the Prophet saith, With whom also James agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guilty of all. Now sith this mortall life is neuer pure or void from sin, whatsoeuer righteousnes we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it shoulde not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousnes. Finally when the righteousnes of workes is entreated of, we must not haue respect to the workes of the law, but to the commandment. Therefore if we seeke righteousnes by the lawe, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two workes: but a perpetuall obedience of the law is there necessarie. Wherefore the Lord doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs for righteousnes that same forgiuenes of sins whereof we haue spoken, that hauing once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousnes in the law, because he should so do nothing els but bring vs into a false hope, & mocke and laugh vs to scorne. For sith no perfection could come to vs so long as we are clothed with this flesh, and sith the lawe threateneth death and iudgement to all them that performe not full righteousnes in work: it shall alway haue whereof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercie of God on the other side did withstande it, to acquite vs from time to time with continuall forgiuenes of sins. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we said at the beginning, that if we be weighed by our owne woorthines, whatsoeuer we purpose or go about, yet we with all our trauailes and endouours are woorthie of death and destruction.

11 Vpon these two points we must strongly stand fast: that there was neuer any work of a godlie man, which if it were examined by the seuerer iudgment of God, was not damnable. Againe, if there be any such shewed, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sins, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is loden, it loofeth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation.

For

For about the beginning of iustification there is no strife betweene vs and the founder sort of schoolemen, but that a sinner being freely deliuered from damnation obtaineth righteoufnesse, and that by the forgiuenesse of finnes: sauing that they vnder the word of iustification comprehend the renewing wherewith we are newly formed by the spirite of God vnto the obedience of the lawe, and they thus describe the righteoufnesse of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good works iudged righteous before God, and by their deseruing is accepted. But the Lord contrariwise pronounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteoufnes, not at the time when he yet serued idols, but when he had alreadie many yeeres excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure hart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteoufnesse reposed in faith. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is saide in the Prophet: The righteous man shall liue by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophane men, whom the Lord iustificth by conuerting them to the faith, but the speech is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of Dauid: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen. But it is certaine, that Dauid speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednes we must not haue one in our life, but hold it throughout al our life. Last of al he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one or two daies, but is perpetuall in the Church. Therefore the faithfull haue euen to the end of their life no other righteoufnes than that which is there set foorth. For Christ euerlastingly remaineth the Mediatour to reconcile the father to vs, and the effectualnesse of his death is euerlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, when euithal our iniquities are couered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we haue the beginning of saluation out of grace, but that we are saved by grace, not of workes, that no man should glorie.

12 The starting holes which the Schoolemen doe here seeke to escape by, doe not deliuer them. They say that good works are not by inward worthinesse in themselves of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteoufnes, but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they be diuine to confesse that the righteoufnesse of workes is in this life alway vnperfect, they grant that we, so long as we liue, doe neede forgiuenesse of finnes, whereby the want of workes may be supplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompensed with workes of supererogation. For I answer, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodnesse wherewith the father embraceth vs in Christ, when he clotheth vs with the innocencie of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficiall meane thereof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteoufnesse of Christ (which as it onely is perfect, so onely can abide the sight of God) must be set in our steede, and be presented at the barre as a surtie. Herewith we being furnished, doe obtaine continuall forgiuenesse of finnes in faith. With the purenesse hereof our filthinesse and vncleannesse of imperfections being couered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the iudgement of God, vntill the hower come, when the olde man being flame and vterly destroyed in vs, the goodnes of God shall receiue vs into blessed peace with the new Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lord in which in receiving vnrupt bodies we shall be remooued into the glorie of the heauenly kingdome.

13 If these things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themselves make vs acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the workes themselves please, but in respect that man being couered with the righteoufnesse of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth obtaineth forgiveness of his finnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternall life to some certaine workes, but onely pronounceth that he which doth these things shall liue: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the deuiſe of righteousnesse in part is largely confuted, ſith no other righteousnesse is admitted into heauen, but a whole obseruing of the lawe. And no whit fonder is that which they are wont to babble of supplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not still returne to the same place from whence they are already ſhut out: that he which keepeth the law in part, is by workes so farre righteous? That which no man of sound iudgement will graunt them, they doe too shamelesly take for confessed. So oft the Lord testifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousnesse of workes, but in the perfect obseruing of his lawe. What obstinacie is it, that we when we are deſtitute of that obseruing, least we should seeme spoyled of all glorie, that is, to haue altogether giuen place to God, doe boast our selues of I wot not what small peeces of a few workes, and go about by satisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions haue already before been sufficiently ouerthrowen, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Onely this I say, that they which so play the fooles, doe not way how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truly they should vnderſtand that the whole righteousnes of men being laid vpon a heape, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abandoned of God, that hee therewithall lost all meane to recouer saluation. Therefore the power of satisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themſelues, but surely shall neuer satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleaſant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purpoſeth to impute finnes. Therefore our finnes must be couered and forgiven, before that the Lord haue respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiveness of finnes is of free grace which they doe wickedly blaſpheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things that are behinde vs, and haſtning forward to those things that are before vs, run in our race, endeououring to the price of the high calling.

14 But how doth the boasting of the workes of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we haue done all things that are commanded vs, we should say that we are vnprofitable seruants, & that we haue don no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to faime or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commanded vs vnfaignedly to thinke and consider with our selues, that we doe not any free beneficiall doings to him, but to render due seruice. And worthily. For we are seruants indetted in so many seruices, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts and all our members, were turned into dutifull deedes of the law. And therefore that which he saith, When ye haue done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if the righteousnesse of one man were more than all the righteousnesse of men. How therefore may wee (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bolde as to boast that we haue added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception and say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeouour may proceede beyonde necessarie duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessarie. For this we must altogether hold, that we can imagine nothing that auaileth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not comprehended vnder the lawe of God. If it be a part of the lawe, let vs not boast of voluntarie liberalitie, where we are bound to necessitie.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleaged: That among the Corinthians he did of his owne wil yeeld of his right, which otherwise he might haue vsed if he had would, and that he hath emploied vpon them not onely so much as he ought of dutie, but also hath giuen them his free trauell beyonde the bounds bounds of duties. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weak. For false and deceitfull workmen did boast themselues with this alluring shew of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospell, so that Paul was driuen of necessitie either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it, than I grant that the Apostle did something of supererogation for the Lorde. But if this were by right required of a wise distributor of the Gospell, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to doe. Finally, although there appeere no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alwaie true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the law to be due to their Lorde. And Christ hath vttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thanke we will giue to a bondseruant when hauing been all the day trauailed with sundry labors he returneth home to vs in the euening. But it is possible, that hee hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for he with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what fort their Supererogations are which these men will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as he neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approue them, nor will allow them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onlie we will grant that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place spoken of these things: Wherefore do yee weye your siluer and nor in bread? Yee spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is in deede not verie hard for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadowe in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne iudge shall sit in his iudgement seat, such windie decrees shal of necessity vanish away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence we may bring to his iudgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two peccitules to be driuen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteoulnes of works. And that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The Scriptures do euery where thrust vs from all maner of affiance, when they teach that our righteoulnesse do stinke in the sight of God, vnlesse they receiue a good sauour from the innocencie of Christ, and that they can do nothing but prouoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be sustained by the tendernesse of his mercy. Moreover they so leaue nothing to vs, but that wee shoulde craue the mercy of our iudge with that confession of Dauid, that none shall be iustified before him, if he require account of his seruants. But where Job saith: If I haue done wickedly, woe to me: but if I do righteously, yet I will not to lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteoulnes of God, wherunto the very Angels answer not: yet he therewithal sheweth that when they come to the iudgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not onely to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeelde than dangerously strue with the rigoroulnes of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteoulnesse in himselfe, than such as at the first moment shoulde fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen awaie, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteoulnesse to these works, the affiance wherof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whither Esai calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may bee praised and glorie in God: because it is most true which he saith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in anie behalfe rest vpon the confidence of workes, nor reioice in the glory of them. But this error encouraged foolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that

John. 3. 16.

Rom. 3. 23.

17 But if we looke to the foure kinds of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accord with workes in the stablishing of our saluation. For the scripture doth euerie where report, that the cause of procuring the eternall life to vs, is the mercie of the heavenly Father and his free loue toward vs: that materiall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which he purchased righteousnesse for vs. What also shall we say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes John comprehendeth together in one sentence, when he saith. God so loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne, that euerie one which beleueth in him may not perish, but may haue cuerlasting life. Nowe the finall cause the Apostle testifieth to bee both the shewing of the righteousnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where hee rehearseth also the other three in expresse wordes. For he saith thus to the Romans: all haue sinned and do neede the glorie of God: but they are iustified freely by his grace. Heere thou hast the head and fountaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: by the redemption which is in Christ Iesu. Here thou hast as it were the matter whereof righteousnesse is made for vs through faith in his blood. Heere is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all he ioyneth the ende, when he saith, vnto the shewing of his righteousnesse that he may be righteous and the righteousmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousnesse standeth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name, that Christ was giuen to vs for reconciliation. So in the first chapter also to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are receiued of God into fauour by mere mercie: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: receiued by faith: all to this ende, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When wee see that all the partes of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that we should now either haue affiance or glorie in workes? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God mooue any controuersie with vs about the efficient or finall cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiall and formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our workes haue a halfe place with faith & the righteousnesse of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to vs for righteousnesse and life, and that this benefit of righteousnesse is possessed by onely faith.

Why holy men doe comfort themselves in the conscience of their owne vprightnes.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbear not to report of it with praise, that is done two waies: either that in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceiue thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust and deserved condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison other, while they record themselves before God, the purenesse of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two waies, we shall see hereafter: Now let vs briefly declare of the latter, how it agreeth with that which we haue abouesaid, that in the iudgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of workes, and glorie vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding & stablishing of their saluation, do without respect of workes bend their eyes to the onely goodnesse of God. And they do not onely bend themselves to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but doe rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of workes: namely so farre as they are the witnessings of God dwelling and reigning in vs. Such therefore this affiance of workes hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first cast the whole

affiance of thy minde vpon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrary to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclude the affiancing of workes, we meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bow to the merit of workes as to the succour of saluation, but should thoroughly rest in the free promise of righteousnes. But we forbid it not to vnderprop & strengthen this faith with the signes of the good wil of God toward it selfe. For if all the good giftes which God hath bestowed vpon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine maner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we are enlightened to behold that soueraigne light of goodnes: much more is the grace of good workes, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is giuen vs.

11 When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their Faith, and gather matter of reioycing, they doe nothing but call to minde by the fruite of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is steadfast assurednesse: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightnesse and simplicitie: haue no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience: but are then only of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: bicause both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assurednes, and the holy ones are priuie in their conscience of such an vprightnesse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnantes of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the frutes of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they doe thereby not slenderly strengthen themselves to looke for the helpe of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their Father in so great a manner. And euen this also they cannot doe, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodnes of God, sealed with no other assurednesse, than of the promise. For if they begin to wey it by good workes, nothing shall be more vncertaine nor more weake: forasmuch as if workes be considered by themselves, they shal no lesse by their imperfection shew prooffe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoever imperfect purenes testify his good wil. Finally they doe so fet out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, depth, and height of them: as if he should say: Whither soeuer the senses of the godly doe turne themselves, how high soeuer they climbe, how farr and wide soeuer they extend them, yet they ought not to goe out of the loue of Christ, but hold themselves wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kinde of measures in it. And therefore he saith that it excelleth and surmounteth about all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnes of God. As in another place, wher he glorieth that al the godly are vanquishers in battell, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

20 We see now that there is not in the holy ones that affiancing of workes, which either giueth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the giftes of God, whereby they reknowlege his goodnes none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may thinke vpon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from the free righteousnes which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in fewe words, but very well set out where he writeth, I do not say to the Lord, despise not the workes of my hands, or I haue sought the Lord with my handes and haue not bene deceived. But I doe not commend the workes of my hands: for I feare, least when thou hast looked vpon them, thou shalt finde more sins than Merites. Onely this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despise not the workes of thy handes, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest me: if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoeuer good workes I haue, they are of thee. He setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his workes to God, because if he haue any good workes, he seeth therein nothing his own: secondly, because the same is also ouerwhelmed with multitude of finnes. Whereupon cometh to passe that the conscience feeleth thereby more feare and dismayng than assurednes. Therefore he would haue God no other wise to looke on his well doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the worke which he hath begun.

In what sense the good which we do, is rearded a cause of that good which God doeth vnto vs.

21 But furthermore whereas the scripture sheweth that the good workes of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doth good to them, that is so to be vnderstanded, that that which we haue before set may stand vnthaken, that the effect of our saluation consisteth in the loue of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Son: the instrument, in the enlightening of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the end is the glorie of the so great kindnes of God. These things withstand not, but that the Lord may embrace workes as inferiour causes. But whence cometh that? Namely whom the Lord of his mercy hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinary dispensation he doth by good workes bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this maner he sometime deriueth eternall life from workes: not for that it is to be ascribed to them: but because whom he hath chosē, them he doth iustifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step toward that which followeth, after a certain maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, he biddeth vs not to flee to workes, but holdeth vs in the only thinking vpon the mercy of God. For what maner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life euerlasting? Why doth he not set righteousnes in comparison against sin, as he setteth life against death? Why doth he not make righteousnes the cause of life, as he maketh sin the cause of death? For so should the comparison of contraries haue stand well together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meant by this comparison to expresse that which was truth, that death is due to the desertings of men: that life is reposed in the only mercy of God. Finally in these maners of speaking is rather expressed the order than the cause: because God in heaping graces vpon graces, taketh cause of the first to ad the second, that he may leaue nothing vndone to the enriching of his seruants: and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet he would haue vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountaine and beginning of it. For although he loucht the gifts which he daily giueth, in so much as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to hold fast that free acceptation, which alone is able to vphold our soules: as for such gifts of his Spirit as he afterward giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

Rom. 6. 13.

The xv. Chapter.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merits of workes, do overthrow as well the praise of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednesse of saluation.

Whether workes though not iustifying may not withstand merit.

NOWE we haue declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that because if righteousnesse be vpholden with workes, it must needs by and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contained in the onely mercie of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in onely faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe stay of the matter, least we be entangled with that generall error, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is moued of the iustification of faith and workes, they flee to those places which which seeme to giue to workes some merite in the sight of God: as though the iustification of workes were fully wonne, if it be once proued that they be of any value with God. But we haue aboue plainly shewed that the righteousness of workes consisteth onely in the perfect keeping of the Law. Whereupon followeth that no man is iustified by workes, but he that hauing climbed vp to the highest top of perfection cannot be proued guilty of any offence be it neuer so little. Therefore it is another and a seuerall question: Howsoeuer workes suffice not to iustifie a man, whether yet doe they not deserue fauor with God?

2 First of the name of Merite I must needs say this afore hand, that whoſoever first applied it to workes of men compared to the iudgement of God, he did very ill provide for the purenes of Faith. Truly I doe by my good will abstaine from strues about wordes, but I would wish that this sobriety had alway bene vsed among Christian writers, that they would not haue found in their hearts to vie words strange from the Scriptures, which ingendred much offence and no fruite. For whereto, I beseech you, was it needfull to haue the name of Merite brought in, when the price of good workes might be sily expressed by another name without offence? But how much offence that word containeth in it, is euident with the great hurt of the world. Surely as it is most proude it can doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with froward pride. The old writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I would to God they had not with the at using of one little word giuen to posteritie matter of error. Howbeit they themselues also doe in many places testifie, how in no case they meant to giue any prejudice against the truth. For thus saith Augustine in one place. Let Merites of Men here hold their peace, which haue perished by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Iesus Christ. Againe, the Saintes giue nothing to their owne Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place. When man seeth that whatſoever good he hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, he seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his owne Merites, but of the mercy of God. You see how taking from men the power of doing well, he also throweth downe the dignite of Merite. And Chrysostome saith, Our workes, if there be any, which follow the free calling of God, are repayment and debt: but the giftes of God are grace and bountifulnes and the greatnes of liberall giuing. But leauing the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing I haue verily before alleged a sentence out of Bernard, As it sufficeth to merite, not to presume of Merites: so to want Merites, sufficeth to iudgement. But by adding fourth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnes of the word, where he saith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou hast them, know that they are giuen hope for fruite, the mercie of God: and so thou hast escaped all danger, of pouertie, vnthankfulness, and presumption. Happy is the Church which neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning he vsed. For of Merites (saith he) why should the Church be carefull, which hath a stedfaster and surer cause to glorie of the purpose of God? God cannot deny himselfe, he will doe that which he hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldst aske, by what Merites may we hope for good things? specially sith thou hearest it said, Not for your sakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to Merite, to know that Merites suffice not.

3 What all our workes deserue, the Scripture sheweth when it saith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of uncleanness: then, what the perfect observing of the law (if any such could be found) shall deserue, when it teacheth that we should thinke our selues vnprofitable seruantes, when we haue done all things that are commaunded vs? because we shall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lord, but onely haue performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good workes which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lord both calleth ours and testifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shall haue rewardes. It is our duetie againe for our part, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our hearts, that we be not wearied with well doing, and to yeelde true thankfulness to so great bountifullnesse of God. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoeuer there is in workes that deserueth praise: that there is not one droppe, which we ought properly to ascribe to our selues. This if we doe truly and earnestly acknowledge, there vanissheth away not onely all affiance but also opinion of Merite. We (I say) doe not parte the praise of good workes (as the Sophisters doe) betweene God and man: but we referue it whole, perfect, and vnmixed to the Lorde. Onely this wee assigne to man, that euery the selfe same workes that were good hee by his vnclannesse corrupteth and defileth. For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect soeuer hee bee, that is not defiled with some spotte. Therefore, let the Lorde call into iudgement euery these things that are best in the workes of men: hee shall verily espie in them his owne righteousnesse, but mans dishonestie and shame. Good workes therefore doe please God and are not vnprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for reward the most large benefits of God: not because they so deserue, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price vnto them. But what spitefulness is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giueth vnto workes that deserue no such thing, doe with ambition full of sacriledge endeouour further, that that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to bee rendered to the merites of men. Heere I appeale to the common iudgement of euery man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a peece of grounde by another mans liberall graunt, do also claime to himselfe the title of proprietie: doth he not by such vnthankfulness deserue to loose the verie selfe possession which he had? Likewise, if a bond-slave being made free of his Lord, do hide the basenes of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a freeman borne: is he not worthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vse of enioying a benefit, if we neither claime to our selues more than is giuen, nor doe defraude the author of the benefit of his praise: but rather do so behaue our selues, that that which he hath giuen from himselfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine maner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what maner of moderation is due to God.

Heb. 13. 6.*

4 I know that the Sophisters doe abuse certaine places, to prooue thereby that name of Merite toward God is founde in the Scriptures. They alledge a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercie shall make place to euery man, according to the Merite of his workes. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in resisting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I denie that they faithfully alledge that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoeuer writer yee were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: πίση ἐλεημοσύνη ποιήσει πικρον, ἔργα γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτῶ ἐνρίσει. He shall make place to euery mercie, and euery man shall finde according to his workes. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these wordes, and by a longer ioyning to iuther of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrues, there is no cause why they should snare vs in one little worde, when in the Greeke wordes of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices do please and are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue and beate downe the outragiousnesse of our pride, that we haue not any worthines to workes beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good workes are continually besprinkled with many filthy spots, wherewith God may be worthily offended & be angry with vs: so far is it off, that they be able to win him to vs, or to prouoke
